which might have been taken. There was one thing which we from the first were determined not to do. We were quite determined not to make useless complaints—not to deal in vague threats or indefinite menaces. We might have taken an exactly opposite course. We might have explained to the country and to foreign nations that we did not think this country was bound either morally or internationally, or that its interests were concerned in the maintenance of the neutrality of Belgium. Though this course might have had some conveniences—though it might have been easy to adhere to it—though it might have saved us from some immediate danger—it is a course which Her Majesty's Government thought it impossible to adopt in the name of the country, with any due regard to the country's honour and to the country's interests. Another course would have been that, maintaining our obligations such as they are described in the Treaty of 1839, we might have simply made a declaration of the determination of this country to resist any interference with the neutrality of Belgium by force of arms. Now, in the first place, such a declaration would have been a direct menace to the Powers who are now engaged in hostilities; in the second place, it would have given an appearance of isolation to our policy; and, in the third place, I do not believe it was the course best calculated to prevent that particular event which we wish to avoid. Your Lordships may ask why, if we rejected this expedient, we did not propose to all the neutral States—at all events to all those who are connected in the same Treaty as ourselves—to make a joint declaration to the belligerents to the same effect. Your Lordships, however, have already had painful experience of the fact that time is a very important element in matters of this kind. It would have been impossible to calculate the time which would have been required for negotiating with these several States, even if they were quite ready to meet our wishes. The exact terms of such an arrangement, how far it was to go, and in what manner it was to be carried out, would have occupied time which it was impossible to calculate. We took a different course. I was authorized by a Cabinet Council held on Saturday week, the 30th of July, to write to both of the belligerents to this effect. I wrote to

France and to the Court of Berlin in the same terms mutatis mutandis. We said Her Majesty's Government had already expressed their satisfaction with the assurance we had received from France, that the Emperor intended to respect the neutrality of Belgium. We said we had received the same assurance from the other belligerent. We added that we thought there could not be a doubt of the duty of both those countries to maintain the obligations of the Treaty which they had severally entered into in common with ourselves and with other countries; but we had observed that in the declaration of both that the promise was conditional on the other belligerent not violating it, and we could not help gathering from that, that, in the opinion of each, such an assurance was not one of a complete character. We, therefore, proposed to each that if they wished to give a more patent proof to the world of their intention, or wished for a clearer assurance from us that we meant to maintain the independence of Belgium, we were ready either to enter into a Treaty or in some solemn instrument to record our common determination. We communicated the proposal to the representatives of Austria and Russia in this country; and, at the same time, we sent it to our representatives at the Courts of both the belligerents and to the neutrals who are parties to this Treaty. I confess I regret that we had not been able to obtain their previous consent; but time was so precious, and our proposal is so much in accordance with the policy which we believe they wish to pursue, that we had no doubt of their concurring in what we had done. I can only add that we have had no direct answer except telegraphic messages from those Courts, but as far as they go Her Majesty's Government think the assurances are of a satisfactory character. With regard to France, she accepted the principle of the new Treaty we proposed; but she desired to make some modifications in its wording, in order, it was stated, to avoid misunderstanding. Her Majesty's Government were not able to accede to any alteration in the draft Treaty itself, but we willingly gave those explanations which we believed in our own mind expressed the simple and clear meaning of the Treaty; and we have every reason to believe that those explanations will remove all objections on the part of France to signing it. We are in hourly expectation of an answer from that Government. With regard to Prussia, I heard nothing till Friday, the 5th of August; but on the morning of that day Count Bernstorff told me he had received a message from Count Bismarck, who had left Berlin in order to be present at the head-quarters of the King. Count Bismarck, he told me, had stated that he had not up to that time received any proposal from Lord Augustus Loftus; but he added that he should be ready to concur in any measure which would strengthen the neutrality of Belgium, though he could only give a general assent until he was acquainted with the document itself. Later in the same day Count Bismarck telegraphed that he had received from Count Bernstorff a summary of the draft Treaty, that he had submitted it to the King, and that His Majesty had authorized him to agree to it. Still later on the same day another telegram reached London, saying that the proposal itself had arrived, with the draft Treaty, and that he authorized Count Bernstorff to sign it as soon as the full powers which were being sent to him reached this country. The heads of the Treaty are these—It reserves all the obligations of the Treaty of 1839; it provides that if the armies of either belligerent violate the neutrality of Belgium, Great Britain will co-operate with the other in defending that neutrality, but does not engage to take part in the general operations of the present war between them; and a corresponding co-operation is pledged by the other parties. The Treaty is to hold good for 12 months after the ratification of a Treaty of peace between the two belligerents. I do not wish to enter into any argument on this question; but, perhaps, your Lordships will allow me to state one or two of the objects which we have proposed to ourselves in taking this course. We believe it would be impossible to give a clearer announcement of our determination on this matter; and yet, while we give it positively and clearly, your Lordships will agree that we do so without menace, or without anything offensive to the two belligerents, with whom we are still in friendly alliance. We think, moreover, that it is calculated to prevent, both politically and strategically, that event which we particularly wished to avoid, and we trust that it is calculated to increase confidence and calm the alarm which has certainly been felt for some days past with regard to a question to which England attaches the greatest possible importance. I am aware that objections may be raised to the course which we have taken, as there might have been to any possible course which we could have selected. There is one objection which I believe is entirely without foundation—namely, that the very fact of this Treaty which we propose being entered into will in the slightest degree impair the obligations of the Treaty of 1839. Those obligations we have expressly reserved in the words of this Treaty. I may remind your Lordships, too, that within the last 20 years a most important Treaty was entered into by some of the greatest Powers of Europe, and that only a fortnight after, without any intervening event whatever, three of them entered into an obligation to defend by arms the guarantee which they had previously given by a Treaty more numerous signed. I have not thought it right to trouble your Lordships with any argument in the matter. I hope I have said enough to show that Her Majesty's Government have not been indifferent, and that they have not been idle in trying to maintain the position which this country ought to hold with regard to this great and important question.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I am sure the House must fully appreciate the motives which have actuated my noble Friend in making the statement, to which your Lordships have just listened, before the Papers have been laid on the Table, and your Lordships have had an opportunity of perusing them. It is satisfactory to find that Her Majesty's Government are determined to maintain the honour of this country—to maintain, as they say, the neutrality of Belgium—and to maintain inviolate Treaties which are now in existence. It would not be convenient—nor, indeed, would it be possible—to enter now into any discussion on the subject, for, however interesting the statement made by my noble Friend, it is obviously impossible to form any decided opinion on the conduct of Her Majesty's Government until we have seen the Papers and thoroughly mastered all the details of the matter. I think, however, I should be wanting in my duty if I did not rise to thank him for making this statement before laying the documents before us, believing as he did that this would meet the wishes of your Lordships. I trust the course which has been taken by the Government on this occasion will be that matters, so far as this country is concerned, will remain as they are, and that we shall be enabled to remain in a state of perfect neutrality, at the same time maintaining inviolate the honour of this country.

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT BILL—(No. 296.)
(The Lord Privy Seal.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD HOUGHTON asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they believe they have power under the Customs Consolidation Act to prohibit the export of munitions of war, and whether they are prepared to exercise that power in the interest of the neutrality of this country between the contending Powers on the Continent? This question had been considered by the Neutrality Commission, of which he was a member, and though the majority of the Commissioners made no distinct recommendation upon it, such a prohibition was advocated by some of the most distinguished and experienced members. He believed that a power of prohibiting the exportation of munitions of war to belligerent Powers was already vested in the Government; but there would be an advantage in making such export absolutely illegal—so as to relieve the Government from the responsibility of stopping that export when the emergency actually arose. Public opinion seriously demanded this step. While conscious how inconvenient it would be to certain branches of trade, how difficult to enforce it in a country where such interferences were rare, and how possible it would be for some munitions of war to escape the vigilance of the public officers, public opinion believed that the measure would be a just and politic one. He trusted to hear that the Government intended to take this course. He regretted that the Report of the Neutrality Commissioners should have been on the Table two years, and should only have been acted upon in this hurried manner, without the possibility of explanation and due consideration. He would further ask whether Her Majesty's Government were justified in the present condition of foreign affairs in proroguing Parliament at all? A short adjournment would answer all the purposes of a Prorogation, and he believed would be more consonant with the feelings of the people. There was a Bill before their Lordships' House which would enable Parliament to be summoned more quickly than heretofore; but the summoning of Parliament at an unusual season always agitated the country and unsettled commerce. He must say he thought it unworthy of the subject and hardly respectful to the Commissioners, to pass the second reading of this Bill without a word of explanation or discussion.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX thought it best simply to answer his noble Friend's Question, without entering into the expediency of proroguing Parliament or into other general questions of policy. There was no doubt the Government had the power of prohibiting the export of munitions of war, or of any articles tending to increase the naval or military force of any other country; but it could only be exercised by a complete and entire prohibition, affecting all other countries indiscriminately—and this had never that he was aware of been exercised, nor did the Government think it expedient that the export of munitions of war to belligerents should be absolutely prohibited.

LORD CAIRNS said, the noble Viscount's answer would tend to dispel a good deal of confusion which prevailed in the public mind on this subject. It could not be too clearly understood that although the Crown could by Order in Council prohibit the export of munitions of war and warlike stores, that power was only intended to be exercised, and could only be exercised, for the purpose of keeping such munitions and stores in this country for the benefit of this country. Moreover it was not a power to prevent exportation to particular places and to particular belligerents. If exercised at all, it must apply to all countries and places whatever—the prohibition must be entire and complete. The consequence was it could not be applied to the present emergency to prevent the supply of munitions to the belligerent Powers. Whether it was expedient now to give the Crown power to prohibit the export of munitions of war to either of the belligerents was a different question, on both sides of which much might be said; but it could hardly be discussed at this period of the Session. It would be easy to empower the Government to prohibit the export of munitions of war which by universal consent were contraband of war; but difficulties arose with respect to coal, and articles which, according to jurists, might or might not be ancipitis usus; in which case the question whether they were contraband of war could only be determined by the Prize Court of the capturing Power. Nothing would be more at variance with International Law than for a neutral Power to take upon itself to decide whether in particular cases articles which were ancipitis usus were or were not contraband of war. On the whole, the Government had acted wisely in not inserting in this Bill such a power.

House in Committee.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, he had refrained from entering into any explanation of the object and provisions of the Bill on occasion of the second reading, on account of the small attendance which could be expected at a Saturday Sitting; but he would now do so very shortly. The Bill repealed the existing law, re-enacting it with such improvements as experience had shown to be desirable. It prohibited subjects of Her Majesty, without licence from the Crown, from taking any part in hostilities between two countries with which Her Majesty was on friendly terms. He need not adduce arguments to show how unjustifiable and monstrous it would be for British subjects to take part in hostilities, when the avowed policy of the Government was that of perfect neutrality; but it was a question not of International but of Municipal Law—not between this country and foreign countries, but between the Crown and the subjects of the Crown. A similar law existed in the United States; while on the Continent Governments were able to prevent their subjects from violating neutrality. The principal objects of the Bill were to prohibit any subject from enlisting or inducing others to enlist in the service of a belligerent Power, and from fitting out, equipping, or arming any vessel for such service. During the American War the powers of the Government in this matter were found to be insufficient. In the case of the Alabama, that vessel left this country before the order of the Government, issued as soon as they had sufficient evidence before them, reached the port, she left our port as an unarmed ship, and only received her armament at sea, beyond our jurisdiction; so that no blame could attach to the Government; and in the case of the Alexandra and of the rams, proceedings before legal tribunals resulted in a proof that the Government had not sufficient power in the matter. They were, therefore, glad to buy the rams in order to avoid any difficulty. This defect would be removed by the present Bill, which was based on the Report of a Commission presided over by the late Lord Cranworth, and composed of other distinguished men. It was no disrespect to them that the Report had not been sooner carried out, for matters of great importance had occupied the attention of Parliament during the past two years; but the pressure of circumstances had now necessitated the passing of a Bill with unusual rapidity. The measure gave power to the Secretary of State to detain a suspected ship; as also to local officers at the ports, who would report to the Secretary of State, so as to cast on him full responsibility. It embodied all the recommendations of the Report, with the exception of that relating to the reception of vessels into British ports, and this object could be accomplished by Orders in Council.

LORD HOUGHTON asked for a more categorical answer to his Question.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, he could only repeat his statement that the Government did possess the power to prohibit the exportation of munitions of war; but the prohibition must be universal.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR remarked that there was no doubt on the point, and that the object of the power in question was to retain in this country all matériel of war. The export could not be forbidden merely to belligerent Powers.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX then moved that Standing Orders, Nos. 37 & 38, be considered, in order to being dispensed with.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he felt it to be useless to oppose the Motion, though it precluded the consideration of additional powers which might advantageously be included in this Bill. He rejoiced that the King of the Belgians, in spite of the large interests of his subjects in the manufacture of arms, had prohibited their exportation to the belligerents; thus setting an example which it behoved this country to follow.

LORD REDESDALE thought the late introduction of this Bill was excusable, as the exigency which called for it had only just arisen. He was not at all disposed, moreover, to blame the Government for getting Parliament to separate as soon as possible.

GLEBE LOANS (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord Dufferin.)

(NO. 280.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Dufferin.)

LORD REDESDALE said, he did not see that any security was taken in the Bill to prevent the alienation of the property upon which money was to be advanced. He thought the Bill required much consideration, and he suggested that it would be better to postpone the Bill for another year, rather than hurrying it through Parliament without due consideration. If the matter were of importance, the Bill ought to have been brought forward at an earlier period of the Session.

LORD DUFFERIN said, there had been no undue haste in passing the Bill, for it had been opposed at almost every stage in the other House. It would occasion great disappointment in Ireland if the passing of the Bill were delayed, for it had been received with favour by all denominations in that country. It secured an object which was originally contemplated at the time of the passing of the Act to disestablish the Irish Church; and, practically, there was not the slightest danger of that alienation which the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees thought it necessary to provide against; for it was not likely that persons would, from religious motives, become responsible for the repayment of the sums to be advanced if there was any probability that the property would be alienated to other uses.

Motion agreed to : Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

LORD CAIRNS said, it was to be regretted that so important a measure should have been introduced at so late a period of the Session; but, at the same time, to refuse to pass it would occasion great disappointment to some religious parties in Ireland who were anxious to avail themselves of the powers of the Bill. He should approve of any properly framed Bill to effect this object; but he saw in this Bill very great peculiarities, indicative of the great haste with which it had been prepared, and which he feared would lead to great inconvenience in the working of it. There was no provision to prevent the alienation of glebe houses or glebe lands from the purpose to which the advance implied that it was to be devoted; but in the Irish Land Bill the Government thought it necessary to take security for 35 years in respect of land purchased by a tenant. A strange phrase had been used in the Bill, utterly at variance with the present state of things in Ireland, for it spoke of a clergyman "having the spiritual charge of a parish or district"—a charge which, in the disestablished condition of the Church, no clergyman could have.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought there was something in the last objection taken by the noble and learned Lord, and proposed to meet it by substituting the phrase used in the Charitable Bequests Act—namely, "officiating in any parish, &c." In relation to the main object of the Bill, it was desirable that it should come into operation while the friends of the disestablished Church were full of zeal to establish ministers in their work and vocation. It was not necessary to make any provision in respect of the particular contingency which noble Lords apprehended, for it was most unlikely to occur. There was no analogy between the Land Act and the Church Act. If those who had established a minister wished to sell the glebe, that must arise from the body being broken up in the district; and, in such a case, there could be no reasonable objection to their being allowed to dispose of the property.

LORD CAIRNS thought the Amendment suggested by the noble and learned Lord would make the matter worse.

LORD REDESDALE moved to insert the following clause:—

"Every house built, enlarged, or improved, and every glebe or house purchased under this Act, shall be thenceforth held and occupied for that purpose only for which the same was originally provided, and shall not be alienated from that purpose without proof having been given to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners that the same is no longer required for that purpose."

LORD DUFFERIN feared it was impossible to accept the clause, for reasons which he had already stated.

LORD REDESDALE said, the noble Lord had not advanced any valid reason for objecting to the clause; and, as to the reason given by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, if it was not likely that alienations would occur, there could be the less difficulty in accepting a provision which prohibited them. Therefore he moved the insertion of the clause.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY reminded the noble Lord that the Bill had been several days before the House, and no Notice had been given of this Amendment.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the Bill had been introduced on the 4th of August, and had therefore gone through all its stages here in four days, including Sunday. He could see no objection to the Amendment. If money was only wanted for the purchase of glebe houses, why not say so?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if the clause were inserted it must go down to be discussed in the other House, where it had been discussed at considerable length already. There was great inconvenience in discussing Amendments that were proposed without Notice, because it was impossible to discover all the objections that might arise to a clause when they had to consider it in a hurry. It might be thought necessary to remove a residence from one part of a parish to another, and to do so it might be necessary to dispose of that already occupied; but if the clause were agreed to it could not be done.

LORD REDESDALE said, the Bill was brought into the other House on the 18th of July, it was read a second time on the 26th, was considered on the 1st August, and read a third time on the 3rd. Every stage of the Bill, except the second reading, had been taken after midnight. Such treatment at this period of the Session was really monstrous.

On Question?—Their Lordships divided:—Contents 13; Not-Contents 30: Majority 17.

Amendments made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ACT REPEAL BILL.

COMMONS' AMENDMENTS.

Order of the Day for considering the Commons' Amendments, read.

LORD CAIRNS expressed his surprise at the course that had been taken with regard to this measure. When the Bill was first introduced considerable objection was taken to it by several noble Lords. Some objected to the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act altogether; others, like a noble Earl (Earl Russell), did not object to the repeal, but objected to the wording of the Bill. For his own part, recognizing, as he did, that the Government were under an obligation to propose some measure of this kind, he was anxious to make it acceptable to both sides of the House. He accordingly proposed certain Amendments, with which he understood the Government were satisfied, and the consequence was that a great number of Peers had left town under the impression that the Bill was beyond the risk of alteration. In the other House of Parliament he was aware that the same thing had taken place. But the Home Secretary had taken an objection to the Bill as altered, in which he must have been misreported; for he could not conceive that the right hon. Gentleman could fall into such a mistake as he was represented to have made. He did not promise to go into the general question at a time when so many of their Lordships who had taken part in the former discussions were absent; and he thought the only course now was to withdraw the Bill till next Session.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he believed there was a considerable difference of opinion as to the words, even among those who were mainly affected by them. It was believed, when the Bill was originally brought in, that it would give general satisfaction; but he was aware that there were several of those affected who preferred the words of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns). There had been some misapprehension on the subject in the other House. He regretted this, as the Government were under a promise to introduce a Bill on this subject in the present year. He did not say that the Bill of his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) was free from all objections; but he could say confidently that it was free from some objections to which the words of his noble and learned Friend were exposed. It was of course impossible to satisfy all parties.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that under these circumstances Her Majesty's Government would not ask their Lordships to agree to the Commons' Amendments, but would withdraw the Bill for the present.

LORD DENMAN said, that in the words of a noble Relation of his, the Bill of 1851 was "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare." He wished that the Amendments repealing the Act could have been agreed to. No one had been prosecuted under it—it was a mere insult to the Roman Catholics, as had been remarked, by a noble Member of the House of Howard, as to the Preamble of the Bill. The Bill ought to have been a real repeal of the original Act.

Order of the Day discharged.

SOUTHWARK PARK, THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES, AND THE THAMES EM- BANKMENT.—PETITION.

LORD REDESDALE presented a Petition from the Vestry of Bermondsey, praying that no part of the land purchased for Southwark Park be let for building purposes: Also to ask whether it is intended to obtain powers next Session to purchase the remaining part of the west side of Parliament Street and the corresponding part of King Street; and whether the architect for the new offices has been desired to prepare plans for completing the Council Office buildings by connecting them with the new offices to be built on the other side of Downing Street, or otherwise, whereby the two blocks of building may be brought in unison: To ask in what manner it is intended to occupy the vacant spaces acquired within the new embankment, and whether it is intended to apply for powers to purchase the buildings below Craven and Northumberland Streets down to the new embankment.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that the Government had not recently directed its attention to the proposed acquisition of the west side of Parliament Street and the corresponding portion of King Street, nor had the architect prepared plans for connecting the Council Office buildings with the new buildings referred to. With regard to the vacant spaces on the new Embankment, he must refer the noble Lord to the recent discussion on the subject in the House of Commons and its result. He had to add that the Government had no intention of buying the buildings below Craven Street and Northumberland Street down to the Embankment.

LORD REDESDALE expressed extreme regret at the manner in which these matters were dealt with; there seemed to be no forethought of any kind exercised upon such subjects. The manner in which the communications between the Embankment and the Strand were to be made was of the utmost importance. If the land were not bought as he suggested a great loss would result to the country, because the value of the property was increasing daily.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow,
Eleven o'clock.

METROPOLIS—APPROACHES TO THE EMBANKMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, If he can inform the House what steps are being taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works to open up approaches to the Embankment from the Strand and Fleet Street, and when such approaches will be available for the public use?

MR. AYRTON, in reply to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, said, he had to state that he was informed by the Metropolitan Board of Works that they were taking steps to open up two approaches to the Thames Embankment, the one from Villiers Street and the other from Norfolk Street, and the works for that purpose would be in hand at an early period.

ARMY—MILITIA DESERTION. QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been drawn to the cases of four Militiamen, by name John Collins, William Osgood, Philip Kearns, and Henry Ives, who were tried on Monday last at the Police Court, Chatham, for being deserters from the Kent Militia Artillery, and in conformity with the Militia Act (1859), 22 & 23 Vict., c. 38, s. 12, were fined forty shillings each and costs, with the option of two calendar months' imprisonment, the case being that the said four prisoners, being artizans, had accepted an engagement on board the Great Eastern Screw Steamer while that vessel was employed in laying a submarine cable, and did not return to England in time to serve with their regiment during the training; and, whether he will, early next Session, propose an Amendment to the Militia Act, giving a discretionary power to magistrates to deal with similar cases according to their merits?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that he did not see anything unusual in the case. The men were absent without leave, and when brought before the justices they were condemned to the smallest possible penalty under the statute.

ARMY—SUPPLYING RESERVE AMMUNITION.—QUESTION.

COLONEL CLIVE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in his opinion, the present system of supplying reserve ammunition to troops in the field is likely to work satisfactorily in action, and, if so, whether he would not consider it desirable that the system should be practised occasionally at our camps of instruction?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the general system of supplying reserve ammunition to troops in the field is already laid down, and is likely to work satisfactorily. A Committee has been sitting to consider it in its details, and the details which they recommend are about to be tried at Aldershot and elsewhere.

THE FRANCO-PRUSSIAN CORRESPONDENCE.—QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If he has observed and can explain the remarkable difference in the dates in the two extracts given below from the Franco-Prussian Correspondence (No. 2), Despatch No. 5, page 4, Count Bismarck to Count Bernstorff—

“When the more modest French designs with reference to Luxemburg had been counteracted by events which are publicly known, the more extensive propositions embracing Belgium and Southern Germany were renewed. It is at this time, in 1867, that Count Benedetti’s manuscript was communicated to me.”

Despatch No. 7, pages 5 and 6, Lord Augustus Loftus to Earl Granville—

“With reference to my telegram of yesterday, I have now the honour to transmit to your Lordship a lithographed copy of the draft of the Treaty of Alliance, offensive and defensive, which M. Beneditti proposed for the acceptance of the Prussian Government at the commencement of 1869, on the eve of the Belgian railway question.”

And if it was not Count Bismarck who gave Lord Augustus Loftus the information on which his Despatch above quoted was based?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the noble Lord is correct in the reference that he makes to the Papers he has quoted. But we are not aware that it was Count Bismarck who gave Lord Augustus Loftus the information upon which the despatch quoted was based. With regard to the affair of M. Benedetti, I think, considering the transactions between the two foreign Governments, and that it is possible the whole of the elucidations of those transactions have not yet been produced, it would be better that I should abstain from giving an explanation which might be imperfect.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE.—QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE said, he wished to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty’s Commissioners of Customs cannot make some arrangement for the safe custody of goods landed at the Custom House in London from steamers in the river till such time as the persons to whom the goods are consigned can attend themselves, or by their agents, bearing a written order to open the packages, the present practice being for the Custom House Officers to allow any self-constituted agent to seize a package, break open even locks, and carry off the goods when passed without any authority whatever, and to conduct the examination in a yard or shed, which is not even the property of Her Majesty, whereby several robberies have recently been committed, and much loss of property has occurred; and, whether the Custom House Officers are not amenable to the law as accessories to these robberies?

MR. STANSFELD said, in reply, that he was sorry he had not had an opportunity of discussing this question personally with the noble Lord, for he might have shown him that he was under considerable misapprehension as to the rights, powers, and duties of Custom House officers. It was not correct to say that the practice was that the Custom House officers should allow any self-constituted agent to seize a package, break open the locks, and carry off the goods. The state of the case was this—The functions of the Custom House officers ceased when they had ascertained whether there were any goods on which duty had to be paid. The right to seize these goods depended on the bill of lading forwarded by the consignee from a foreign port.

WRITERS UNDER THE BOARD OF CUSTOMS.—QUESTION.

MR. REED said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the result of his communication to the Board of Customs will secure to the "Writers" in that department during this summer a fortnight's leave of absence without loss of pay?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, that this was one of the questions now under discussion between the Treasury and the Board of Customs, and he hoped a decision would be come to in the course of 10 days or a fortnight.

THE WAR—PRODUCTION OF PAPERS. QUESTION.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT: I beg, Sir, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will undertake that any further Papers, with reference to the War, shall be communicated to Parliament in time to allow of a discussion on their contents before the Prorogation?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it would be very difficult for me to promise absolutely that further Papers with respect to the War should be communicated to Parliament in time to allow of discussion before the Prorogation, if the arrangements as to the Prorogation should be finally confirmed to-morrow. According to the state of Business, it appears that the Prorogation may, in the natural course, be on Wednesday. It is very possible that we may be able to lay Papers on the Table to-morrow; and, with the permission of the House, after the Questions are concluded, I will endeavour to state, as exactly as I can, what has occurred so far as the Government are concerned, and then hon. Gentlemen present will be able to judge.

METROPOLIS—THE FOREIGN CATTLE MARKET.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Corporation of London have taken any and what measures for the provision of a Foreign Cattle Market?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that the Markets Committee of the Corporation of London had submitted to the Privy Council a site which they considered sufficient for the purposes of the proposed market. The only reason why further measures had not been taken was, that up to the present time the Privy Council were not fully convinced that there would be sufficient water accommodation at the site. Inquiries were made into the matter, and until those inquiries were completed nothing further could be done.

THE NEW FOREST.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he would beg in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett) to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can promise that no sale or other permanent appropriation of Crown Land in the New Forest shall take place until Parliament has had an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the subject?

MR. STANSFELD replied that there could be no considerable sale or appropriation of land without an Act of Parliament for disafforesting the New Forest. There was a limited power under the Act 10 Geo. IV., c. 50, enabling the Commissioners, under certain conditions, to alienate small portions of the forest not exceeding in value £1,000. but there was not the slightest chance that any considerable appropriation would be made.

HARBOURS OF THE COLONIES AND OF INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he would beg, in the absence of his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon), to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the Defence of the Harbours of the Colonies and of India, Whether the "Cerberus" has left for Melbourne, and whether the "Abyssinia" and the "Magdala" have left for Bombay; and whether applications have been received from other Colonies for similar ships for the defence of their Harbours; and, whether such applications would be complied with, the cost of maintenance being undertaken by the Colony so applying?

MR. CHILDERS said, in reply, that he had received a communication from the Colonial Office proposing the necessary arrangements for handing over the Cerberus to the Colony, but the vessel had not yet left. The Abyssinia and the Magdala had not left for Bombay. As to whether applications had been made from other Colonies for similar ships for the defence of their harbours, he had to say that the Cerberus was built at the cost of the Colony of Victoria, and that the Colonial Naval Defence Act provided for her future status and discipline. He was a party to the introduction of the Bill, which he thought very valuable, and Her Majesty's Government would be very glad to see other Colonies take advantage of the Act. He did not think, however, there was any application on the subject at present.

CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What special arrangements under the new system of open competition for Civil Service vacancies, to be in force from the thirty-first of this month, will be made to meet the cases of those employés of the Civil Service who, having been deprived of appointments through recent reduction or abolition of office, are now awaiting re-appointment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the case of such employés has not been overlooked. They are mentioned expressly in section 7 of the Order in Council. The exact steps that will be taken with regard to the matter are not yet settled.

METROPOLIS—TEMPLE BAR.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he can hold out any hope to the House that he will be able to convince the Metropolitan Board of Works, on artistic and utilitarian grounds, that Temple Bar ought to be removed or widened during the erection of the New Law Courts; and whether he, in his official capacity, does not think that the time has come for removing the barrier at the end of Fleet Street, whereby all traffic passing along it is brought to a slow speed, if not almost to a standstill, thereby inflicting a loss of time amounting to an enormous aggregate upon all those who have to pass through the narrow block passage to the City?

MR. AYRTON said, in reply, that he was not able at this moment to state what might be the views of the Metropolitan Board of Works with reference to Temple Bar. He regretted that the gentleman who had so long and ably filled the office of Chairman of that Board had died that morning. He hoped the office might be filled up by a man of equal intelligence and judgment; and, if so, he had no doubt that the Board would be led to the conclusion that the sooner Temple Bar was removed the better for the public. The space Temple Bar occupied was about 11 feet, and therefore it was quite clear if Temple Bar was removed 11 feet would be available for some purpose or other. But it was not merely that Temple Bar was an obstruction: everybody must feel that it was divested of every possible interest, whether artistical or otherwise.

ARMY—BREECH-LOADERS FOR THE VOLUNTEERS.—QUESTION.

In answer to a Question from Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH,

MR. CARDWELL said: I am not prepared to enter into an engagement to furnish breech-loaders to any particular corps of Volunteers. It is my intention to lay down rules for the gradual arming of the Volunteers with breech-loaders; but it is necessary to take precautions with respect to their custody, since they require much greater care than is at present paid in many instances to the muzzle-loading Enfields. I may take this opportunity of repeating that it is intended to publish as soon as possible Regulations by which officers and sergeants can qualify so as to earn within the year the £2 10s., making in all £4, which is necessary as the equivalent for an additional 5s. to the Capitation Grant. They will be framed with a view of rendering it as little inconvenient as possible to every qualified officer to obtain the necessary certificate, and though opportunities of attending schools of instruction will be afforded to those who require it, those who are qualified already will be enabled to obtain the certificate without doing so, and by simple examination at head-quarters. It will also be made less troublesome to earn £1 10s. to those whose shooting enables them to attain the required class in a smaller number of rounds, and the standard will be only 30 points for those who continue to fire with the present weapon. The Regulations will also provide additional facilities for a portion of the force to go to camps of exercise, by a contribution towards the expense of constructing the camps, with arrangements for obtaining rations at contract prices.

THE PRAYER BOOK.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, seeing that the Table of Lessons Bill has been withdrawn, Her Majesty's Government will consider the further Report of the Ritual Commission, with a view to seeing whether they cannot introduce a measure next Session to make such alterations in the Rubric as may be advisable?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government reluctantly abandoned the intention of prosecuting the Bill for amending the Prayer Book by the substitution of a new Table of Lessons, solely on the ground that they found unequivocal evidence that many hon. Members, well entitled to be heard on such a subject, and by no means confined to one section or party in this House, were disposed to object to our proceeding with such a Bill at the end of the Session, and likewise to contend that it was not desirable to deal with the Lectionary apart from the rest of the Prayer Book. Those allegations were of such a character that the Government felt it would be their duty to defer to them. The hon. Gentleman has stated that considerable inconvenience arises from a stagnation of the trade connected with the printing and binding of Prayer Books, and I am afraid I am not in a position to deny that such stagnation of the trade does exist. But the Question which he puts to me is a serious one—namely, whether we will consider the further Report of the Ritual Commission with the view of introducing, if possible, early next Session a Bill dealing with the whole subject of the Rubric. That is a most grave matter, and I am sorry to say it is totally impossible for the Government—which has not yet received the Report—to enter into any engagement whatever respecting it. The only thing which I, for one, have heard is, that the Commission has experienced extreme difficulty in dealing with the question, and that a considerable degree of diversity of opinion exhibited itself in the Commission. If that be so, it would be rash on the part of the Government even to hold language which at this stage might create an expectation that they would be able to deal with the question at a very early period. Upon a matter of this kind it would be extremely difficult for the Government to enter, except when the way is prepared by a great union of opinion, otherwise they might do additional harm by raising serious and prolonged controversies.

NAVY—NAVAL STORES, &amp;c.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is true, as reported in "The Western Morning News" of the 3rd August, that the "Agincourt" and "Northumberland" having been ordered to sea, it was found that they could not leave in consequence of the almost total absence of shells and ammunition at the Bull Point Magazine; whether the "Audacious," "Iron Duke," and "Vanguard," now fitting at Devonport, will be delayed for want of tanks, of which there are none in store to fit them, several of that size having been sold three or four months ago; if it is true that the "Captain" and "Monarch" are 246 Palliser shot short of their complement, or half the number, and that there are none in store, and that the plant at Woolwich can only turn out seven or eight a day; and what steam factory accommodation the Admiralty possess in the Thames and Medway for refitting a North Sea fleet since the closing of Woolwich Dockyard and Factory?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the Questions of the hon. and gallant Gentleman concern the War Office more than the Admiralty, as the Secretary of State for War has under him the establishments at Woolwich and the magazines; but I have my right hon. Friend's permission to reply to so much of these Questions as concern him. In answer, then, to the first Question, I have to say that it is not true either that the Agincourt and Northumberland were delayed in going to sea, or that there is an almost total absence of shells and ammunition at the Bull Point Magazine. Both ships went to sea to the hour, and there is an ample reserve, both of shells and ammunition at the magazines. The origin of the rumour is that for some short time past the Palliser projectiles have been in course of examination, and that, in consequence, on the day when the ships sailed, out of 2,380 projectiles, which was the complement of each, 180, or 8 per cent, were short in the Agincourt, and 119, or 5 per cent, were short in the Northumberland. These were sent out on the following day in the Monarch. There is not a word of truth in the report as to the tanks of the Audacious, Iron Duke, and Vanguard. The Audacious and Vanguard had their tanks on board a long time ago, and the Iron Duke, which recently came round to Plymouth, will have hers in good time. There is no deficiency in the store of tanks. The tanks which were sold some time ago, were unserviceable, and were only sold without being broken up for old iron because it was anticipated that they would, as they did, fetch a better price. As to the projectiles in the Captain and Monarch, the facts are these—The full complement of shell is on board, and there is a sufficient supply in store of shot of the old pattern; but recently the Admiralty have agreed with the War Office to make shot for the 12-inch guns of an altered pattern, and when these ships went to sea it was thought better only to take a half supply of the new pattern than some of the old and some of the new. They therefore took 80 rounds per gun of the new pattern, which is far more than sufficient for an experimental cruise. I find from Colonel Milward that, instead of seven or eight, the plant at Woolwich can turn out 25 to 30 projectiles a day—and more with a small expenditure if necessary—and the Admiralty have arranged with the War Office the proportion of shot and shell. As to the last Question, the hon. and Gentleman, who has been at the Admiralty, knows the capacity of the factory at Sheerness, and the amount of factory work which has been done at Chatham. I presume, however, that his Question points to some supposed work which cannot now be done for a fleet such as the Channel Fleet, after an action in the North Sea, in consequence of the closing of Woolwich. To that I have only to reply that not one of the iron-clads in the Channel Fleet could have gone into Woolwich Dockyard had it been open, and that its factory could only have been of service to the smaller class of iron-clads, none of which are in the Channel Fleet.

MR. WHITWELL said, seeing that the condition of things is altered since the first Naval Votes were allowed by the House, he would beg to ask the First Lord, Whether he would feel himself bound by the statement made on Vote 11 of the Navy Estimates, that no expense would be incurred on the Chatham Extension Works beyond that provided in this year's Vote?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I am much obliged to my hon. Friend for giving me Notice of his Question. In the debate on Vote 11 of the Navy Estimates I gave him a pledge that we would not spend on the Chatham Dockyard Extension Works more than was clearly provided in those Estimates. But the circumstances under which the House has voted us a large credit justify me, I think, in saying that I do not consider myself bound by that pledge; and I hope by about Christmas next to have finished the first basin, two docks, and the approaches from the workshops, and also to have dredged the river so that they may be available for our largest iron-clads.

NAVY—CASE OF SERJEANT JACOB HILL.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would beg, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Pemberton) to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Correspondence relating to the trial by Court-Martial of Serjeant Jacob Hill, of the Marine Light Infantry; and whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been taken on the legality of the sentence?

MR. CHILDERS said, in reply, that Serjeant Jacob Hill, of the Marine Light Infantry, was charged, he believed, with procuring or assisting in the desertion of some men from a Regiment of Militia, was found guilty, and punished by reduction to the ranks. After the trial a solicitor wrote to the Admiralty on his behalf, raising some technical objections which the Admiralty were advised had nothing in them. He did not think that was a case in which Parliament would wish to have before it the correspondence on the subject. It would be quite contrary to all precedent; and he must, therefore, respectfully decline to lay the Papers on the Table.

PILOTING BELLIGERENT MEN-OF-WAR. QUESTION.

MR. W. N. HODGSON: I wish, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether representations have been made to Her Majesty's Government by the Prussian Ambassador complaining that English Pilots have been engaged in piloting French Men-of-War?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, whether a formal representation to the effect stated by the hon. Member has been made to the Foreign Office I am unable to say, although it is a matter that I could easily have ascertained before coming down to the House, had I had previous Notice of the hon. Member's Question. I, however, mentioned on a former day that the subject had been dealt with by Her Majesty's Government, and that specific directions had been given with reference to piloting belligerent vessels of war, to the effect that no English pilots were to give assistance to the ships of war of the belligerent Powers, except for the purpose of steering them out of or into a British port, or in case of distress.

STOCK OF COALS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR JOHN HAY: Sir, I desire to make a personal explanation, which I had intended doing on Friday last, but then deferred in consequence of the absence—I regret to say through ill-health—of the Secretary to the Admiralty. Being under the impression that Supply would not be taken until Thursday, I was, unfortunately, not in my place on Wednesday last, but on the following day my attention was called to a report of some observations of the Secretary to the Admiralty, occupying some 25 or 30 lines in The Times newspaper, which were devoted to impugning the accuracy of the statement I had made on a previous occasion to the House. Immediately on seeing that report I thought it right to give the hon. Member for Montrose notice that I should take an early opportunity of making the explanation I am now about to give the House. In reply to my communication I received the following letter from the hon. Gentleman:—

“Dundee, Aug 5.

“Dear Sir John Hay,—Your favour of yesterday has been sent to me here. I am not well, and unable to return to town, and you will please for that reason excuse me employing an amanuensis. I have not seen any report of what I said on Wednesday; but I did not impugn your accuracy. All that I said in regard to your quotations from the Coal Return was that you should have read the last sentence of the note at the top of the page, and I went on to remark that as the statements of the small stocks on the last day of January, if unexplained, might cause apprehension in the country, I would state the stocks at present in these depôts, and the quantities shipped but not arrived. There was a good deal of talking in the House at the time, and it is quite possible the reporters did not catch my words; but I said nothing about you except what I have just stated, and of course you are at liberty to make what use you please of this letter.

“Believe me, truly yours,

“W. E. BAXTER.”

The Return was a very long one, and I read only such portions of it as I believed bore out my statement respecting the great diminution that had occurred in our stocks of coal. I may observe that the Return does not show the specific number of tons of coal that were at sea and on their way to the respective depôts, but it was in the power of the hon. Member to have quoted any portions of it he thought fit. Another point upon which the hon. Member impugned my accuracy was with reference to the statement I made relating to the quantity of coal in Pembroke Dockyard. The statement I made was founded upon information given to me by the late storekeeper of that dockyard, from whom I have received the following letter:—

“3, Cranleigh Villas, Watford, July 29.

“Dear Sir John Hay,—I called a few days ago at the Admiralty, on Mr. Baxter, to offer him a suggestion, as I had been invited to do. Before I could enter on the subject Mr. Baxter informed me that he could hold no communication with me until I had written a letter to correct or to deny the accuracy of a statement made by you in the House of Commons, from information supplied by me, with reference to supplies of coals at Pembroke. I had not then seen, and until yesterday was unable to find The Times report of your speech, to which Mr. Baxter referred me, but, having seen it, I can find nothing to correct, and it appears to me that Mr. Baxter has drawn inferences which are not supported by what you said.

“I have the honour to be, dear Sir John Hay,

“Your most obedient servant,

“E. CHEVALLIER.

“Admiral Sir J. C. D. Hay, Bart, M.P., &c.”

I have read that letter with the view of showing that I accurately stated the nature of the information I had received, and which I believe to be correct.

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I do not know whether the House will expect me, in the absence of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, to volunteer any explanation of the first part of the hon. and gallant Baronet's remarks, which relate to something that occurred here the other evening. I think that the note of my hon. Friend, which has just been read, gives a very satisfactory explanation of that part of the subject. The hon. and gallant Baronet has, however, thought fit to import into his explanation something not relating in any way to what had been said by any person on this side of the House, but which referred to a statement he made some time ago, founded upon information he obtained from a gentleman who has no longer any relations with the Admiralty. What the hon. and gallant Baronet said upon the occasion to which he refers was this—that he had received information that a particular officer in Pembroke Dockyard had taken a particular course in the purchase of coal, and that that officer had been severely reprimanded by his superiors or had been complained of.

SIR JOHN HAY: If the right hon. Gentleman desires it, I will read what I then stated to the House. ["Order."] I merely wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he is inaccurate in his version of the statement I then made.

MR. CHILDERS: I have only one word further to quote from the hon. and gallant Baronet's observations "and that he was superannuated."

SIR JOHN HAY: That is not what I stated.

MR. CHILDERS: Then I have nothing more to say in the matter. That, however, is what the hon. and gallant Baronet is reported to have said.

SIR JOHN HAY: I have The Times report in my hand. I will hand it to the right hon. Gentleman to read to the House. It certainly does not contain the words he professes to quote.

NEUTRALITY OF BELGIUM.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in view of the approaching Prorogation of Parliament, I am anxious to state at as early a period as possible that Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to lay further Papers upon the Table relating to the subject alluded to in the Question of the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Somerset Beaumont). Knowing well the anxiety which the House must feel with reference to the course which the Government intend to follow, I will in a few sentences explain to them exactly what we have done and what we have endeavoured to do. In so doing I shall confine myself strictly to statements of fact, not mixing up with them anything in the nature of explanation or defence, if, indeed, defence be requisite, but will allow such explanation or defence to stand over until the proper opportunity for making it shall arrive. On Saturday, the 30th of July, the Government made a proposal to France and Prussia severally in identical terms, and that proposal was that an engagement should be contracted by this country with each of them, whether under the name of a Treaty or whatever other designation might be given to the agreement, to this effect—that if the armies of either one of the belligerents should, in the course of the operations of the war, violate the neutrality of Belgium, as secured by the terms of the Treaty of 1839, this country should co-operate with the other belligerent in defence of that neutrality by arms. It was signified in the document so transmitted that Great Britain would not by that engagement, or by acting upon that engagement in case of need, be bound to take part in the general operations of the war. And, of course, the other contracting party was to enter into a similar undertaking to use force for the preservation of the neutrality of Belgium against the offending Power. We proposed that the Treaty or engagement—for it has now taken the form of a Treaty—should hold good for 12 months after the ratification of a Treaty of Peace between the two belligerent Powers, after which period it is stipulated that the respective parties being parties to the Treaty of 1839 shall fall back upon the obligations they took upon themselves under that Treaty. Briefly stated and divested of all technical language, that, I think, is the whole of the contents of the proposed Treaty. On the same day—last Saturday week—and two days before the discussion which occurred in this House in connection with foreign affairs, the whole proposal was made known by the British Government to the Austrian and the Russian Governments, and confidence was expressed that, under the extreme pressure that existed as to time, those Powers would not hesitate to adopt a similar measure. That is the course Her Majesty's Government have followed in the matter. Now as to the reception of this proposal by the other Powers. As far as we have been informed the Governments of both Austria and Russia take a favourable view of the proposal. I will not say that the negotiation has proceeded so far as to entitle us to regard them as held bound to a particular course; but, in the main, I may say that the reception of our proposal has been favourable by both of those Powers. And now, with regard to the two belligerent Powers. The proposal having been sent to Lord Augustus Loftus on the 30th ult., on Friday the 5th inst., Count Bernstorff informed Earl Granville that Count Bismarck had left Berlin for head-quarters, and that, consequently, the communication with him through Lord Augustus Loftus had been delayed. The terms of the proposed Treaty, however, having been communicated on the same day—Saturday week—to the respective Ambassadors in London, Count Bernstorff had telegraphed their substance to Count Bismarck, who had informed him that he had not then received any proposal from Lord Augustus Loftus, that he was ready to agree to any engagement that would tend to the maintenance of the neutrality of Belgium; but that, as the intended instrument was not before him, he could only give a general assent to its purport, and must not be regarded as bound to any particular mode of proceeding intended to secure that neutrality. Count Bernstorff subsequently informed Earl Granville on the same day, on the 5th of August, that he had received a later telegram from Count Bismarck to the effect that he had then received a summary of the draft Treaty from him, that he had submitted it to the King of Prussia, and that he was authorized to state that His Majesty had agreed to the plan. Later still on the same day Count Bernstorff informed Earl Granville that Count Bismarck again telegraphed to him stating that he had seen the actual document, and authorizing him to sign the Treaty. Count Bernstorff has not yet—at least, had not when I came down to the House—received his full powers in the technical sense, but he expects to receive them in the course of the day, and therefore I think that the engagement may be regarded as being completed on the part of Prussia. Now as regards France. That country has accepted the principle of the Treaty, but the French Government were desirous to introduce some modifications into the terms of the instrument that were not of a nature, as we thought, in any degree to interfere with the substance of the clauses. The House will perceive that as we had made an identical proposal to the two Powers, it was impossible for us to undertake to alter the body of the instrument, for fear the whole arrangements might come to nothing, although the sole object of the modifications so proposed was to prevent misunderstanding. We had no difficulty in giving such an explanation as we thought amounted to no more than a simple and clear interpretation of the document. That explanation was sent to Paris on Saturday evening. Perhaps the pressure of affairs in Paris may naturally account for the fact that an answer did not arrive by return of post in a regular manner this morning; but we have reason to believe that this explanation will remove all difficulty on the part of the French Government and will lead to the signing of the Treaty. Possibly, therefore, even before the termination of the present Sitting it will be in our power to make a further communication to the House. In the meantime I shall be glad to answer any question, if my statement has not been sufficiently clear; but, as I said before, I should wish to refrain from saying more than is absolutely necessary on the present occasion, and I hope the House will not enter into any general discussion upon the subject.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I do not know whether I shall be required to put myself regular in accordance with the forms of the House; but, perhaps, under the remarkable circumstances of the moment, and considering the statement we have just heard from the right hon. Gentleman, I may be allowed to say a few words in reference to the important matter which he has brought under our notice. I do not know what opportunity we may have of learning the progress of the negotiations to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred before the Prorogation of Parliament. If the House meets to-morrow, of course we may have that opportunity; but I do not know whether the state of Business may cause us to meet to-morrow. Now, as to the proposed Treaty, it is necessarily difficult to gather from an oral statement the meaning of a diplomatic document; but I infer from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that Her Majesty's Government have taken decided steps to maintain and defend the neutrality of Belgium. That will be a satisfactory intimation to the country generally. I would not myself at this moment give any opinion as to the particular diplomatic course followed by the Government on this occasion. That is really too grave a question to be decided in an off-hand manner in the course of a conversation like this; but as a general proposition, where there is a Treaty guarantee so explicit as that expressed in the Treaty of 1839, I think the wisdom of founding on that another Treaty which involves us in engagements may be open to doubt. I do not at present understand, if we join with one of the belligerents to vindicate the neutrality of Belgium against the other belligerent in case he violates that neutrality, what limit there is to be to our interference; because it would appear to me that in such a case we should have to share the fortunes of war with the belligerent whom we have joined, and it is quite impossible to see how we could limit our co-operation with that belligerent merely to the frontier of the neutralized country. But this is one of the points on which, owing to the manner in which the proposal of the Government has been communicated to us by the right hon. Gentleman, it is difficult to form an opinion; but I may venture to express a hope that during the brief period of existence now allotted to this Session the Government should omit no opportunity of giving this House and the country the fullest account of this new engagement they may have entered into, and the latest information on these matters they may have obtained. Now, Sir, accepting the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman as the declaration of the Cabinet, that they are resolved to maintain the neutrality and independence of Belgium, I accept it as a wise and spirited policy, and a policy, in my opinion, not the less wise because it is spirited. I cannot myself believe the position of England is such that she can no longer take an interest in the affairs of the Continent of Europe, or attempt to exercise that influence which has been so often exercised not only with advantage to this country, but with great benefit to the Continent itself. The policy of England ought certainly not to be a merely European policy. She has an ocean empire, and an Asiatic empire. But she has a great interest in the prosperity, the peace, and the independence of the various States of Europe. Viewing it from a very limited point of view, it is of the highest importance to this country that the whole coast from Ostend to the North Sea should be in the possession of free and flourishing communities, from whose ambition the liberty and independence neither of England nor of any other country can be menaced. We find that part of Europe at present constituted in such a manner, and it is well such a position of affairs should be maintained. The circumstances under which that state of society was injuriously menaced some years ago, though the distribution of territory which then took place has been in some degree diminished, has, I think, led to many of those complications which have so distressed and alarmed us. I make no comments on the startling events which are now occurring. I have never spoken of them in this House with any prejudice. I wish we may maintain the friendship and alliance both of France and Prussia. I am of opinion that the events now occurring afford an opportunity to a Power like England of coming forward with a friendship which cannot be doubted, to give counsels of moderation in such a manner as will show that, while anxious for the peace of Europe, she respects the dignity and national feelings of both belligerents.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I think that the House will allow me to say a few words in answer to what I may call the Question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), and that in my case, as in that of the right hon. Gentleman, it will not be necessary to make a Motion. I admit with the right hon. Gentleman that it is impossible for him or any other Gentleman to give any opinion on the subject of my statement except with reserve, because in such cases listening to an oral statement is very different from reading the document itself. But I hope I am not over-estimating the length to which the right hon. Gentleman goes in his judgment when I say I am glad he is disposed to view in a favourable manner what he seems to consider a wise policy. At the same time I wish now to say that the reason we restrained our own wish and the wish of the House last Monday by not making any general declaration on our part as regards Belgium was that we thought much danger might arise from such a declaration, that we might inadvertently give utterance to words that might be held to import obligations almost unlimited and almost irrespectively of circumstances. We had made up our minds that we had a duty to perform, and we thought that a specific declaration of what we thought to be the obligations of this country, founded upon the various considerations applicable to the case, would be much more satisfactory than any general declaration. It is by this instrument we ourselves desire that our view of the obligations of this country should be defined rather than by any vague expressions which might be used in reference to those obligations. The right hon. Gentleman said that as a general rule he would rather trust to Treaties which at present exist than cumulate them by other engagements. That observation reminded me that I might have pointed out more clearly what we thought was the necessity for this proposed Treaty. When the war broke out, we naturally looked to the declaration of the belligerents as to the neutrality of Belgium, and we were obliged to admit, as I think the House must have admitted, that those declarations contained everything that could reasonably have been expected from each Power speaking singly for itself; but, notwithstanding that, there was this weakness about them. In the event of the violation of the neutrality of Belgium by Prussia, France held herself released, and in the event of the violation of neutrality by France, Prussia held herself released. I think we had no right to complain of either Power. I think they said everything they could have been expected to say; but we thought that by contracting a joint engagement we might remove the difficulty and prevent Belgium from being sacrificed, and render it extremely unlikely that anything would arise to compromise our neutrality. That was our reason for thinking a Treaty of this kind necessary, because it is obvious that the Treaty of 1839, whatever value it may possess, could hardly be supposed to meet the circumstances of the present case with reference to the declarations made by the belligerent Powers. With regard to further opportunities for informing the House of our proceedings, I believe, and I may consider it as arranged, that the House will meet to-morrow and on Wednesday; and, certainly, it will be our desire not less than our duty to communicate to the House the substance of everything which we may propose to undertake in the defence of the honour and the fulfilment of the obligations of this country.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE BILL—[Bill 249.]

(Lords.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BRUCE, in moving, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, said, that it had been arranged that the Motion to be proposed by an hon. Member for the rejection of this Bill should be considered at this stage, instead of on the second reading. The House was aware that this was one of three important measures introduced by the Government in reference to the constitution of legal tribunals. Two of these Bills had been withdrawn, but a similar course had not been pursued with respect to this Bill, notwithstanding the near approach of the termination of the Session, because of the urgent necessity which existed for strengthening the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The business of the Judicial Committee consisted mainly of appeals from India and the Colonies, and also included certain important appeals from the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. At this moment there were no fewer than 257 appeals unheard from the High Court of Judicature in Calcutta alone, not to mention those from the other Presidencies of India and the Colonies. From the High Court of Judicature in Calcutta no appeal had been heard which had not been filed before 1866. When the House considered the enormous loss and injury to suitors which must arise from such a state of things, the necessity for an immediate remedy would become apparent. The evil, he thought, lay in the voluntary character of the arrangements with regard to the Court. Under the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV. it consisted of the Lord President for the time being, the Lord Chancellor, all the ex-Chancellors, the Judges of the Superior Courts at Westminster, the Chief Judge of the Court of Admiralty, the Chief Judge of the Court of Probate, the two Lords Justices, and the Master of the Rolls. A certain number of persons, who had at some previous time held those offices, might also sit in the Committee on being made Privy Councillors. There were at present 11 of them. Under the 3 & 4 Will. IV., Her Majesty had power to name also as Judges two other persons who were not included in the above denominations, and under that authority some of the most eminent persons who had taken an important part in the administration of the appellate jurisdiction had been appointed. In proof of this statement he need only allude to the services of the late Lord Kingsdown, to Sir James Colville, and to Sir Joseph Napier. Amongst retired Judges who had taken part in the business of the Committee he might mention Mr. Justice Patteson, Sir John Taylor Coleridge, and Sir Vaughan Williams. The Judges had undoubtedly been very assiduous in their attendance, but there had been much difficulty in securing the continuous session of the Court. Of course, there might be a question whether a Court of Appeal should not be created in India, or whether the number of cases might not be diminished by raising the limit beyond £1,000, the present lowest amount which could be the subject of appeal; but the immediate question was how the Court itself could be strengthened, so as to secure an attendance de die in diem of competent persons. The Bill proposed, in the first place, that persons who had filled the office of Chief Judge in any of the principal Courts in India, and persons who had filled the office of Legal Member of the Council of the Governor General of India, might receive, in addition to their pensions, a salary of £1,000 a year, so as to give the country a claim upon their continuous services on the Judicial Committee. It was also proposed that any person who was a member of the Judicial Committee, other than those who had filled the judicial offices already mentioned, might receive a sum not exceeding £500 a year out of the Consolidated Fund, the object being that Judges who might retire in the vigour of their intellect and their powers might receive an adequate remuneration for converting a position of dignified leisure into one of full activity. Objection might, perhaps, be raised at first sight to the smallness of the sum named; but the intention was to place those Judges, as far as remuneration was concerned, exactly upon the same footing that they were at present. The salary of a Judge who was not a Chief Justice was £5,000 a year, in fixing which salary the expenses of circuit, about £500 a year, had been taken into account. The retiring pension, therefore, of a Judge who had served for 15 years being £3,500, an additional £500 a year would place him, as far as remuneration was concerned, nearly in the same position which he at present occupied. By a further clause of the Bill it had been proposed to take power to appoint any barrister of 15 years' standing, who should also be a Privy Councillor, and that persons so appointed should have conferred upon them a salary of £2,500 a year. To this clause he was aware that very general objection was taken among members of the legal profession. On the other hand, there was much to be said in support of the proposal. Some of the most eminent Judges who had ever adorned the Bench, and some who still adorned it, had never been in receipt of a professional income of £2,500 a year. It would be invidious, perhaps, to name them; but members of the legal profession were well aware that there were many such cases. ["No, no!"] One of the most able Judges now upon the Bench was appointed by a late Lord Chancellor, and objection was taken to him on account of the extreme smallness of the income which he had been known to make when at the Bar. He believed he was very much within the truth when he stated that that learned Judge never, during the time when he was at the Bar, made a salary equal to £2,500 a year. The objection taken to his appointment was exclusively on the ground of the smallness of his professional income, although he was known to be a very able and judicious advocate. He might also appeal to his hon. and learned Friends connected with the Chancery Bar whether it was not notorious that the late Lord Cranworth, until he became Solicitor General, never made £2,500 a year. Yet, when he was appointed Baron of the Exchequer, he made an excellent Common Law Judge. He became successively Lord Justice and Lord Chancellor, and nobody could doubt his judicial capacity. It was unnecessary, however, to discuss the subject further, for the Government, knowing the opposition that was raised by members of the legal profession, did not intend to press this clause. Bearing also in mind that, owing to the period of the Session, there was not time for a full consideration of the subject, they proposed that the duration of the Bill should be limited to one year. Next year the constitution of the Judicial Committee must necessarily be considered in connection with the High Court of Judicature Bill and the Court of Appeal Bill, which had been dropped during the present Session; and if any circumstances should arise next year to prevent the Government from giving effect to their intentions with regard to these Bills, it would be quite possible to give to the Act of this year a more extended operation. There was a clause, not included in the present Bill, which, he thought, might well be added. It was known that there were Judges who, from considerations affecting their health or other circumstances, would gladly retire before the expiration of the period at which they could claim their full pensions—Judges of great judicial experience, great knowledge and learning, still equal to some continuous work, but not equal to the strain of being obliged to travel on circuit, as well as to attend the Courts of Law and Equity in London. To meet such cases it would be necessary to introduce a clause, of which he had not yet given Notice, enabling a Judge, after 10 years' service, to resign on his full pension, upon the understanding that during the remainder of the period of his 15 years' service the country would have a claim upon his exertions as a member of the Judicial Committee. There would be thus, under the proposals of the Government, three classes of Judges whose services would be secured. First of all, there would be those—of whom at this moment we had an eminent example, in fact, more than one example, in this country—men who had served the office of Chief Justice of one of the three principal Courts in India; next, there would be those who had acted as the Legal Members of the Council in India, and he knew that men of very distinguished legal abilities had filled that office. There would be next the Judges who had retired, and who, for an additional payment of £500 a year, would give the country a claim upon their continuous services. And, finally, there would be Judges who had served 10 years, and who, in consideration of being allowed to retire on the full pension, would undertake the less arduous but still responsible duties of the Judicial Committee. The Government were aware of the difficulties attendant on bringing forward so important a Bill at this late period of the Session, but the pressing nature of the subject itself and the accumulation of arrears rendered some legislation on the subject necessary. The Government had endeavoured to anticipate objections by removing the clause which had excited most adverse criticism. He, therefore, hoped the House would proceed with the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

Mr. WATKIN WILLIAMS, who had given Notice of Motion for the commitment of the Bill on that day three months, said, that the ground of his objection to the measure was that the effect of it would be to reduce the highest appellate tribunal in the world to the condition of a second or third-rate Court. He did not attempt to dispute the inconvenience arising from the accumulation of arrears before the Judicial Committee, or that there was a very great "blockup" of business. Stated shortly, the remedy proposed by the Government consisted of two parts; the first—the introduction of paid Judges and of regular and continuous sittings; and the second—the reduction of the quorum of the Judges from four to three, and the giving power to the Committee to sit in two divisions for the despatch of business. Now, what were the duties of that great tribunal, which, almost upon the last day of the Session, it was proposed to remodel? Their jurisdiction was to advise Her Majesty upon the appeals presented to her from every Colony and every dependency of the British Crown over the whole world, involving every conceivable question that could arise between subject and subject, or between the subject and the Crown; important questions of criminal and constitutional law, of commercial and maritime law; questions, also, of International and prize law, and intricate questions of the conflict of laws. Cases from the remotest corners of the world—from British Columbia, Canada, the Cape, Natal, the Mauritius, Ceylon, India, Australia, and New Zealand, and even from China—came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Nor was this all, for to this infinite variety of questions was to be added the great variety in the laws to be applied—English law, Roman Dutch law, French law, Hindu law, English law as modified by the colonial statutes, and a variety of others. Notwithstanding these great difficulties, the Judicial Committee, during nearly 40 years, had exercised its functions not only to the satisfaction of the suitors, but had so advised the Crown in its actions as to place the Committee in the very foremost rank as an appellate tribunal. Its advice and reports were held both in America and France, as well as in England, as judgments of the highest legal authority; and he ventured to say that there was no Appellate Court in the world—none certainly in England—that could for one moment stand side by side as regarded reputation with that great Court. There was no pretence for saying that the House of Lords could be compared with the Judicial Committee in that respect; perhaps one reason was that the Judicial Committee gave their advice to the Crown upon grounds of plain justice and common sense unfettered by technicalities. He, therefore, asked the House to pause before, at the fag-end of a Session, they ran the risk of reducing the Judicial Committee from the position it had gained to that of a third-rate tribunal. Let him remind the House what was the present constitution of this High Court. Before 1833, all appeals to the Crown were referred to the Privy Council at large. That was found to be unsatisfactory, and by the 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 41, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was constituted, and under that Act consisted of the Lord President of the Council, the Lord Chancellor, and the following, being Privy Counsellors—namely, the Chief Justices, Chief Baron, and Judges and Barons of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, Master of the Rolls, Vice Chancellor of England, Judges of the Admiralty Court and of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Ex-Presidents, Ex-Chancellors, and those who have filled any of the above offices, and any two others selected by the Crown, and to these have also to be added, under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, the Lords Justices of Appeal. All had been picked men of the very highest attainments. These men had performed the duties gratuitously. He was prepared to admit that gratuitous services were open to objection; but, nevertheless, those learned Judges had brought this tribunal into a position of which Englishmen in every part of the world might be proud. The objection he had to this Bill was, that it would deprive the State of the services of these men. It was made a matter of money, and at the same time the value set upon the services of the Judges was only £2,500 a year, one-half the salary of a Vice Chancellor or a Puisne Judge; and the result would be that men who had thought it the highest honour to be chosen members of the Judicial Committee would no longer accept the office. Men of the greatest attainments looked to this position as the highest distinction that could be conferred upon them in recognition of public services, great learning, and proved judicial qualifications.

But, by making it a question of money, the whole system was altered, and the existing attraction done away with. The present proposition was, that there should be four paid Judges; that the sum to be given should not exceed in all £5,000 a year; that the Judicial Committee should sit in two divisions; and that the salaried Judges should be bound to attend and render a quid pro quo.

MR. BRUCE said, this proposition as to £5,000 a year referred to an entirely different state of things—namely, that this sum should go to one paid barrister at £2,500, and to the increase of the salaries of other persons. It was impossible that any of the persons so paid should have only half as much as a retired Puisne Judge; inasmuch as the retired Judge would have his pension of £3,500, and this, with the addition of £500, would make his position as good as before, taking into account the expenses of circuit.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, the right hon. Gentleman was entirely inaccurate; a Puisne Judge had £5,000 a year, and his point was, that the employment of a paid Judge at a salary of £2,500 marked that as the value of his services. But if the Bill had been so materially changed at the last moment, that was an argument against going on with so important a measure at the fag-end of the Session. He appealed to the Law Officers of the Crown whether the proposed alteration of the constitution of that great tribunal, to that of a tribunal made up of paid Judges with inferior salaries, sitting regularly and continuously with only three members, would not tend to its degradation and ruin as a final Court of Appeal? There was something which, even to lawyers, was more than money, and that was the honourable recognition of the legal ability, learning, and judicial qualifications requisite for the highest appellate tribunal. He entirely objected, as a rule, to appointing men to the highest Court of Appeal who had not proved by service on the Bench that they possessed temper, judgment, discretion, patience, and those judicial qualities which could only be tested by actual experience. Again, although that Bill was intended by its authors to make the sittings of the Judicial Committee more regular and of longer duration than at present, the effect of Clause 7 would positively be to reduce them, as the legal "vacation" time, which was to be excluded from the regular sittings, comprised 274 out of the 365 days of the year, leaving only three months for these sittings. That, of course, was not the object of its framers; but this fact showed how imperfectly and loosely the Bill had been drawn, and the House ought not at the fag-end of the Session to be called upon to pass it. Moreover, when the reconstruction of the whole of our judicial system was undergoing consideration, the constitution of that great appellate tribunal might well be allowed to form part of that scheme. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving, as an Amendment, that the House should go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Watkin Williams,)—instead thereof.

MR. HENLEY said, that after the statement made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department it was impossible not to feel that a very heavy responsibility rested on the Government for suffering such a state of things to grow up as he had detailed to the House, because there was no doubt that to a certain class of Her Majesty's subjects it was almost a denial of justice when appeals were postponed from time to time, as had been the case in that great tribunal. But that was not the only question they had to consider. Was it, he asked, on the balance of convenience and inconvenience better to adopt a bad remedy which was to go on only for a few months, or to wait for another before dealing with the matter? The addition they now proposed to the Judicial Committee was not equal to the elements of which it was now composed. Questions of International Law came before that tribunal, and it also decided on religious questions. It might be said these new Judges would not decide those great questions; but if that were so, was it just to the millions of our fellow-subjects in our Colonies and in India, who came to the Sovereign of this country for justice, to create a tribunal inferior to that which determined those grave matters among ourselves? It was indecent for the Government to press that measure within two or three days of the end of the Session, when to discuss it was a simple impossibility; and while they were attempting to correct the evil of a great arrear of appeals they might create an evil a thousand times greater by destroying the character of that tribunal. A number of appeals might be settled, but they might not be settled upon sound grounds, and more harm would be done to all parties concerned than could result from letting the question stand over till the beginning of next Session, when the Government might consider and bring in a measure which they themselves believed would be permanent. By limiting the operation of that Bill to a year, the Government showed that they had but little confidence in what they were doing. He did not pretend to go into the question itself; but he must express his deep regret that three days before the end of the Session, when there was no chance of the Bill being properly discussed, there should be an attempt to carry the measure through by the mere force which the Government had at their command. He believed it to be a hasty and ill-considered measure, and if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Watkin Williams) went to a Division he would vote against it.

Mr. JAMES said, he thought that everyone must feel sympathy with the efforts of the Government to do all they could to remedy what must be admitted to be a very great scandal, and he admitted that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had gone far to disarm opposition by the withdrawal of the 3rd clause. He could not, however, understand how this Bill could be considered a temporary measure. His great objection to it was that the very Judge from whose decision those Indian appeals were made was actually to review and determine the wisdom of his own decisions. It appeared to him to be far better to delay the enactment of a measure on this subject for a few months longer than to pass the present Bill hastily at the end of the Session. The real remedy for the evils complained of was not to be found in this patchwork attempt at legislation. With the greatest respect to Mr. Maine, a gentleman whose great learning was admitted, he could not think that the proposal to put among the Judges of the Judicial Committee a gentleman who had had no judicial experience was at all a satisfactory one. It was to be apprehended that the economical scheme of inducing retiring Judges to accept of seats in the Judicial Committee would lead to men of failing health and very advanced years becoming members of that tribunal. He held that either by high payment or honourable distinction the services of the best men ought to be secured for the Judicial Committee.

COLONEL SYKES said, he approved of the Bill on the ground that the continual postponement of cases brought before the Court was a practical denial of justice, and if the measure were put off till next Session there would be an enormous accumulation of appeals from India. When men were paid for the discharge of a duty those who employed them had a right to exact the performance of that duty. The House had no power to appropriate the Revenues of India to paying the salaries of the two Indian Judges whom it was proposed to appoint.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought that unless the Government could answer satisfactorily the objection against appointing a gentleman to a Judgeship under the Bill, from whose decisions in India those appeals were made, it was only reasonable that they should assent to a postponement of any legislation on the subject until next Session.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the fallacy which appeared to pervade this discussion was that because a great many objections could be urged against this measure it ought not to be carried. But against a great number of things that ought to be done it was possible to urge objections, and this was one of those things. The evil this measure proposed to remedy was admitted on all hands. It was a very great and a growing one. The evil of large arrears of cases in an Appeal Court was much greater than that of arrears in any other Court, because in the latter case the inconvenience was simply one of delay, whereas in the former the longer the hearing was deferred the more appeals there would be. They would, in fact, increase in a geometrical ratio. When once appeals got into arrear the temptation to parties to appeal for the purposes of delay would be irresistible, especially in a country like India, where the interest of money was something like 10 per cent. Well, but how did hon. Members propose to remedy the evil which they admitted to exist? Simply by doing nothing at all. [Cries of "No, no!"] Yes, they objected to any legislation that Session, asking the Government to wait until February next, when, from Calcutta alone, there would probably be about 100 more appeals added to the list, already inconveniently long. They were called upon now by a great emergency to do something to vindicate their character for justice and business habits. Though the Bill was only for one year, what would be done under it would be permanent. Persons holding the most dignified judicial positions would constitute the new proposed Court. At present the appointments were in the absolute discretion of the Crown. Those appointed need not even be barristers, for the Crown might appoint two Bishops if it pleased. What new materials would they have at their command next year to assist them in their legislation upon this question, beyond what they had at present? The Bill would compel the attendance of those Judges, who, in consequence, must be paid for their specific services. It was of the highest importance that one of the Judges, at all events, should be well versed in Mahomedan law in consequence of the vast number of Indian appeals that came before the Court. The Crown had therefore advised the appointment of Sir James Colville, an ex-Judge of the Supreme Court of India. It was ridiculous to suppose that all the judgments had been given in India by one Judge. Hon. Gentlemen who argued that it would be improper to appoint a Judge who had a knowledge of Indian Courts of Law from his having administered justice there, seemed to give very little weight to the acumen which would be brought to bear upon the cases by the learned Judges with whom he would be associated. On these grounds he hoped that the House would assent to going into Committee on this Bill.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, the question was not whether the evil existed; that was admitted; but whether the remedy proposed was a fit and proper one. Neither in the House nor out of it had they been able to find a single member of the legal profession who could say a good word for this Bill. The Bill want to degrade one of the greatest Courts in the country. It would patch up a bad system, and prevent their dealing as they ought to do with the question of the appellate jurisdiction. The proper course to take was to do away with the duplicate authority of an appellate jurisdiction, by the establishment of a Court of Cassation, which would command the highest judicial and professional ability to be had in this country. The evil of waiting for six months for a real and proper remedy for a great and crying evil would be far less disadvantageous than that of passing a measure which anticipated what ought to be done in the future, and placed a serious obstacle in the way of a great and necessary reform. He should therefore vote against the Bill.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 45: Majority 19.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On Question, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS moved that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

MR. BRUCE said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not pursue that course. It was not in accordance with the usual practice. He had made his statement, and the sense of the House had been fairly taken on the question.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, he thought that the course he had taken was entirely in accordance with the practice of the House. But it was contrary to practice to press a measure of this immense magnitude at the fig-end of a Session, and he was prepared to avail himself of all the forms of the House in order to frustrate it. He denied that the sense of the House had been fairly taken. If those Members who had been brought into the House in order to hear the Question put, and who had voted for the Bill, had heard the previous discussion, he believed many of them would have voted against the Bill.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he thought the House ought to hear the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown relative to this Bill.

Question put, "That the Preamble be postponed."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 39 ; Noes 63 : Majority 24.

Preamble agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Power of Her Majesty to appoint two retired Indian Judges as salaried members of the Judicial Committee).

MR. BRUCE proposed an Amendment to the effect that the annual payment of £1,000 to be made to each of the two members of the Judicial Committee should come out of the Revenues of India.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "There shall be paid out of the revenues of India to any person appointed a member of the Judicial Committee in pursuance of this section, during the time that he serves as a member of such committee, an annual payment not exceeding one thousand pounds, in addition to any pension he may be entitled to in respect of his services in India."—(Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

COLONEL SYKES said, the Amendment of the Secretary of State was in direct violation of the Act for the better government of India, of August, 1858. When the Act was under discussion, in which he (Colonel Sykes) took an active part, very strong opinions were expressed of the inexpediency and even danger of permitting the House of Commons to control or dispose of the finances of India, as an unscrupulous Minister might apply them to political purposes ; and the result was the unanimous adoption of the following clause in the Act, under the head of Revenue :—

"The expenditure of the Revenues of India, both in India and elsewhere, shall be subject to the control of the Secretary of State in Council, and no grant or appropriation of any part of such Revenues or any other property coming into the possession of the Secretary of State in Council by virtue of this Act shall be made without the concurrence of a majority of Members of the Council present at a meeting."

It was evident, therefore, the Amendment could not be legally moved. He must consequently move that the following words be added to the Amendment :

—"With the consent of the Secretary of State for India in Council."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, adding, after the word "India," the words "with the consent of the Secretary of State for India in Council."—(Colonel Sykes.)

MR. LOCKE said, he did not understand why there should be an "annual payment" if the Bill was intended, according to the explanation of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce), as an experiment for only one year.

COLONEL SYKES said, he might explain that it was only the Indian Council who could deal with the Revenues of that country.

MR. BRUCE said he thought the words would be unnecessary, for this Act would of itself be sufficient authority for the payment being made.

MR. JAMES said, he objected to the Revenue of India being applied to the payment of the salaries of Judges who were to hear cases other than Indian ones—colonial appeals, patent cases, ecclesiastical appeals, &c. India had to bear the whole cost of her Government and whatever other expenses England imposed upon her. When suitors from India appeared before the Privy Council they had to pay large fees, which ought to be sufficient to provide for the salaries of the Judges who heard their cases. Money ought not to be taken from India to maintain an English Court.

MR. BRUCE said, there would probably be 20 members of the Judicial Committee. It was only proposed to pay out of the Indian Revenue those two members of the Judicial Committee who gave special attention to Indian matters, but Indian suitors would also have the services of all the other Judges, who were paid out of the Imperial Exchequer. Nothing could be fairer towards the people of India than this payment of £2,000 when the advantages to them of the existence of this Court were taken into account.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he was sorry to hear that the Government intended to press this proposal for saddling the finances of India with the payment of a paltry sum of £2,000 a year.

MR. FAWCETT said, he had never listened to a more unsatisfactory answer than that given by his right hon. Friend

(Mr. Bruce). He begged to ask this question, on which his vote would depend—Would the Government say that it was fair and right for the Colonies also to pay their share of the expenses of this Court? and, if not, why should a distinction be made to the disadvantage of India? This was another melancholy instance of the proposals made in the House of Commons at the expense of the people of India, who had no power to protect themselves.

COLONEL SYKES insisted that the British Parliament had a right to appropriate the finances of India to any purpose they chose.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, it was a proceeding utterly unexampled for a Government to press forward a measure of Law Reform which they could not get their own Law Officers to support. The Attorney General and Solicitor General had been distinctly challenged to rise in their places and support the Bill; but, like honest men, they had left the House.

MR. EASTWICK said, he feared it would make a bad impression in India when the people there learnt that a clause so vitally affecting them had been settled in the very last days of the Session.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) was doubtless aware that we could not tax the Colonies, that being one of the fruits of the American War. But if the hon. Member contended that, as a matter of justice, a Colony ought not to contribute to the expenses of a tribunal existing mainly, or to a very great degree, for the convenience of the people of that Colony, he must join issue with him. If the Colonies took up so much of the time of the tribunal as India would do they certainly ought to assist in maintaining it. Hon. Gentlemen talked of the people of India, but they forgot the people of England. On what ground of fairness were the taxpayers of this country to be saddled with the cost of the very best tribunal which could be provided for doing justice—not between the people of this country, but between the ryots of India? No doubt an Act of Parliament had been passed directing that the Revenues of India should be appropriated to the Secretary of State in Council for India, but the House of Commons at its pleasure could alter that Act or could substitute another enactment.

MR. JAMES said, he must distinctly assert that this Court would not be maintained by the taxpayers of England, but by the fees paid by the Indian suitors and others. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would actually be in receipt of the fees from those suitors, and yet wished to make the Indian people pay this £2,000 twice over.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was good for anything it meant that the House of Commons might appropriate the Revenues of India to political objects, the very thing which the Act of Parliament had been passed to prevent. He must accordingly press his Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 48: Majority 12.

MR. BRUCE said, he wished to state that he should be prepared to move an Amendment limiting the duration of the Bill to a year. He assumed that the Court of Appeal would not exclude men who had held high judicial appointments—men who were of the stuff of which the Judicial Committee should be made.

MR. LOCKE said, that probably the Court of Appeal would not exclude them, but the question was would the public pay them. He must point out that though the Bill should only exist for one year the offices created under it would be permanent, and the officers filling them would have to be paid their salaries year after year.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, that the proposal to make this Bill endure only for a year would at first sight lead people to suppose that the appointments would be only for a year. But when once appointed these Judges would be permanent, and therefore the objections to the Bill continued in all their force. It was unjust and impolitic that this country should tax the people of India for advising Her Majesty as to the decisions that should be given in cases of appeal.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, there was a great precedent for this transaction. The British Empire desired to do honour to the Sultan of Turkey and gave a grand ball on that account. But the British Empire was too poor to pay for it out of its own pocket, and therefore made the people of India pay for it. That was the precedent Her Majesty's Government desired to follow. The time had not arrived when we could pay for our own magnificence, and therefore we must put our hands into other people's pockets. The Government ought to get some lawyer to support them. The Lord Advocate had retired; but there was an Irish Law Officer on the Treasury Bench, and if the Government could get him to say something in support of the Bill it would give confidence to the profession.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would ask the Committee to consider what would happen if they passed this Bill. The Government could not discuss the finances of India on the 5th of August, and yet three days after when they defeated opposition by official votes they proposed to lay down a most important principle. It was the first time in the history of this country that, without the consent of the Secretary for India or the Council of India, two days before the close of the Session, a Bill was proposed imposing a tax on the people of India. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that we did not lay such a charge on the Colonies because we could not, owing to the American War. That was a doctrine which would not be forgotten by the people of India. He lately read a letter from India, written by a gentleman who probably knew more about that country than anyone in England, and he said that these small acts of petty, contemptible meanness had produced a worse effect upon the people of India than if we levied an annual tribute on them. If we levied £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 upon them, they would say there was something Royal in that; it would fall in with their ideas of magnificence; but these repeated acts of meanness and shabbiness were unworthy of a great country and ought to be reprobated by the independent feeling of the House of Commons.

MR. BRUCE asked whether, apart from all other considerations, it was not better that the people of India should contribute £2,000 a year to the creation of a great Court of Appeal than that they should have a Court constituted in India, the whole expense of which should be borne by themselves?

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he did not see any such alternative. It would be abandoning the duty of the Imperial Government if we were to say to the Colonies—"You must pay for the constitution of the Court that is to hear your appeals." Nothing could tend more to loosen the bonds which united our Colonies to us.

MR. BRISTOWE said, he wished to record his protest against the House of Commons taxing a dependency for the maintenance of an English Court of Justice.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the unanimous opinion of the legal profession was decidedly against the Bill. Hon. and learned Gentlemen on the Government side had pronounced against it; but some hon. Members, who had not heard the discussion, had voted with the Government, and among them in the late Division was the hon. and learned Attorney General. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would see by the coming Division the position in which he was placed.

DR. BREWER said, it was not unreasonable to ask that the subjects of the Crown should contribute to the expenses of the Court.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, it was totally unworthy of a rich country like Great Britain to impose such a paltry tax on a poor country like India.

MR. MONK said, that, as a great number of appeals came from India, it was only right that India should pay its quota towards the expense of the tribunal which was to decide them.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, in answer to the remark of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he must express his conviction that if that Bill passed the men who had made that tribunal the pride of England, and the greatest Appeal Court in the world, would decline to serve on it.

Question put, "That the words

'There shall be paid out of the revenues of India to any person appointed a member of the Judicial Committee in pursuance of this section, during the time that he serves as a member of such committee, an annual payment not exceeding one thousand pounds, in addition to any pension he may be entitled to in respect of his services in India,' be added at the end of Clause 2."

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

The Committee divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 36: Majority 2.

MR. BRUCE then rose and said, that the Government had brought in the Bill really with an honest desire to provide for a state of things which they believed to be a most crying evil, and the effect of its rejection would inevitably be the postponement for a full 12 months of any improvement of that great Court of Appeal for India and the Colonies. At the same time, the Government felt the disadvantage of pressing forward so important a measure at that period of the Session, and were conscious that they could not carry it without the general support and approbation of the House. Even if it went on they would have, at a later stage, to appeal to the consideration and friendly aid of the House to dispense with some of its ordinary forms in order to pass it; and it was impossible, after the Division which had just occurred, that they could make such an appeal with any hope of success. Therefore nothing remained for the Government but to abandon the Bill.

CLERICAL DISABILITIES BILL.

LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Lords' Amendments considered.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he had to move that the House do disagree from the Amendments. They were, in fact, only one Amendment, for they all hung together, and were all referrible to one point—namely, the omission of the 7th clause of the original Bill, which allowed a clergyman who might have given up the active performance of his duties in the hot haste of his youth to resume them subject to the discretion of the Archbishop of the Province, after a few years of mature reflection, with his mind ripened and his religious feelings deepened. The Lords had struck out that clause, and he now invited the House to restore it in the name of toleration and of religion itself. It was said that this clause would let in the "black sheep." He denied it. The black sheep were the men who would simply change the clerical dress for a shooting jacket, and lounge at Homburg till they were tired of the life and then come back and take a living. Those who executed the deed under this Bill would be earnest though mistaken seekers after truth—men like Mr. Macnaught, who had gone back after a season of doubt and was doing again such good work at Liverpool. These were the persons whom the Bill in its present shape would alone of all men exclude, for the residue of their life, from the possibility of the Ministry.

MR. MONK said, he had intended to move the rejection of the 7th clause, but ultimately he thought it better to leave the matter to be dealt with by the Lords. The Bishop of London and other right rev. Prelates objected to allowing a clergyman to play fast and loose with his sacred calling. He would support the Lords' Amendment.

MR. CANDLISH said, he should support the view of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope), as he desired to give others the liberty which he prized for himself.

MR. J. D. LEWIS said, that the original promoters of the Bill did not agree about the 7th clause, and it was unprovided for in the Preamble.

MR. BRUCE said, the question was whether the House of Commons should imperil the Bill by rejecting the Lords' Amendment. He thought the result of rejecting the Lords' Amendment would be to defeat the Bill, and, therefore, though personally he was of the same opinion as his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope), he would vote for the Motion that this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment.

MR. KINNAIRD said, out of all the private Members' Bills not more than three would become law this Session. He hoped, therefore, that the success of this one would not be imperilled.

Page 3, leave out Clause 7, the first Amendment, read a second time.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 9: Majority 32.

Subsequent Amendments agreed to.

ARMY—ARTILLERY AND RIFLES.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he rose to move for an Address for—

"Returns of the number of Field and of Horse Artillery Batteries at home, with the number of men and of horses attached to each Battery, and the number of men and of horses required to place each Battery in a condition for active service in the field; of the number of Field Guns in store; and of the number of sets of Harness in store."

He had also to move an Address for

"Returns of the number of Breech-loading Infantry Rifles produced since the adoption of the Snider breech-loading principle, giving the numbers obtained by the conversion of muzzle-loading rifles into breech-loaders; of the number obtained by the direct manufacture of Breech-loaders; of the number of Breech-loading Rifles issued to the regular troops and the reserve forces, specifying the number issued to each regiment; and of the number of Breech-loading Rifles of all descriptions now in store."

He would take that opportunity of asking the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), whether he was in a position to give him any information on the subject of those Returns, and whether it was proposed to arm the Volunteers, who, in his opinion, had been badly treated in return for their services, with breech-loading rifles?

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War having intimated to the hon. Member (Mr. Sinclair Aytoun) that he had no objection to the Returns he moved for being given, he did not think it necessary to enter in detail into the subject before the House. There were 10 batteries of Royal Horse Artillery and 20 field batteries, which gave a total force of this arm which was supposed to be sufficient for a force of 60,000 men. The Royal Horse Artillery batteries had each six guns and three waggons, 172 officers and men, and 112 horses, while the field batteries had six guns, six waggons, 180 officers and men, and 84 horses—making a total of 180 guns, to every one of which six trained horses were attached, four trained horses, which would be available for gun service, being attached to each wagon. The Director General of the Ordnance was of opinion that this was a larger force of artillery for a peace establishment than was maintained by any other country in the world. With respect to the reserves, they were amply sufficient to supply deficiencies. There were a number of batteries in store at Woolwich, which were now being overhauled and put in fresh order. With regard to the number of breech-loading firearms, the Secretary of State for War had more than once stated that there 300,000 in store. At the present moment there were 269,964 breech-loading rifles and 39,456 breech-loading carbines in store, making a total of upwards of 309,000. With regard to the supply of this arm to the Volunteer Force, he was sure he only expressed the opinion of his right hon. Friend when he said that no one more highly estimated the character and value of that force than he did, and it was from no disposition to underrate them that he had not put the Snider arm into their hands. His right hon. Friend had, at an earlier hour in the evening, stated that it was his intention to arm the Volunteer Force gradually with the Snider rifle; but, as that was a very valuable arm, it would be necessary that some rules and regulations should be framed for its safe and proper custody. When that was done a distribution would be made. Purchases of horses were being made to make up the required number for the Artillery.

CENSUS BILL.

COMMONS' REASONS.

Commons' Reasons considered, (according to Order).

THE EARL OF MORLEY moved, that their Lordships do not insist on the Amendments to which the Commons disagreed. The principal of these Amendments was that made by their Lordships providing for what had been termed a religious Census.

LORD CAIRNS said, that while Parliamentary practice required the House of Commons to assign Reasons for disagreeing to an Amendment, it provided no means of inventing good Reasons where none existed. In the present case they had, therefore, been obliged to assign two Reasons as bad and insufficient as could be imagined—namely, that an inquiry into religious opinions would be objectionable to a large number of people, and that the expense involved in it was not worth incurring. After the course which the Government and the House of Commons had adopted it was useless to press the matter; but he only hoped that when any question arose as to the number of adherents of various religious denominations in England, it would not be again suggested, as had been done on former occasions, that those who opposed this Census were able to number themselves by millions in this country.

Motion agreed to: the Amendments to which the Commons disagree not insisted on.

THE NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.

QUESTION.

LORD DENMAN, in pursuance of a Notice, asked what was the estimate for the new Courts of Justice, and whether that estimate included the £20,000 lately voted for clearing the site? He observed that Sir Richard Malins, in the House of Commons, had declared that the Consolidated Fund must supply funds for the clearing of streets, while only two Courts were necessary, in Lincoln's Inn. He contended that this enormous expenditure was quite unnecessary, and he was sure that their Lordships would pause before they gave unlimited power to any architect, by departing from the course which had been adopted by the late Earl of Derby as to the Courts of Justice Building Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE replied, that the estimate was £750,000 and that there was no reason to suppose that it would be exceeded. The £20,000 voted for clearing the site was on account of this sum.

House adjourned at Two o'clock,
till To-morrow, half-past Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 9th August, 1870.

MINUTES.]—NEW WARRANT ISSUED—For Plymouth, v. Sir Robert Porrett Collier, Knight, Recorder of Bristol.

PUBLIC BILL—*Ordered—First Reading—Statute Law Revision (Ireland)* [264].*

The House met at half after Twelve of the clock.

STATISTICAL RETURNS OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.—QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether the Committee appointed last year to consider the revision of the Statistical Returns published by the Board of Trade have yet completed their labours; and, when the result of their inquiries is likely to be made public?

MR. SHAW LEFÈVRE: In reply, Sir, to the hon. Member, I have to state that the departmental committee to which he refers reported to the Treasury in May last upon the improvements to be effected in the form of the trade accounts; as to the means to be adopted for issuing them earlier to the public, and, further, as to the organization of that branch of the Customs which deals with this subject. It was stated a few days ago by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury that the Report had been submitted to the Commissioners of the Customs for their opinion as to how far it was practicable to carry out these changes, and I understand that they have within the last day or two given their opinion. It will, therefore, now rest with the Treasury to determine whether they will carry out the recommendations of the committee, so far as the organization of the Department is concerned, and until this is determined, in my opinion it will not be possible to make the improvements in the accounts which are also recommended.

THE WELLINGTON MONUMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can undertake that no further steps should be taken in the matter of the Wellington Monument until the matter can be fully discussed in Parliament, and an opportunity be given to the artist to make the explanations which are not included in the Papers laid before Parliament?

MR. AYRTON said, in reply, that on the 14th of April last Mr. Penrose was informed that an inquiry would be held into the proceedings in reference to the Wellington Monument, and the letter then addressed to him gave him ample notice that he might offer any explanations on the subject. On the 21st of April a letter was addressed to Mr. Stevens, the sculptor, informing him that an inquiry would be made, and that he would have ample opportunity for giving any explanations in his power. No explanation, however, was given by Mr. Penrose or Mr. Stevens that was at all satisfactory to the gentlemen who conducted the inquiry. It was not until the 20th of July last that Mr. Penrose was informed that his services as superintending architect would be dispensed with, and Mr. Stevens was informed that his contract would be annulled in consequence of his default. Both gentlemen had had ample opportunity since then of affording explanations with respect to their conduct, but they had not done so. Mr. Penrose wrote a letter which gave no explanation at all, and Mr. Stevens wrote another which appeared to make his position much worse than before. It had become necessary to hand that letter over to the solicitor of the Department of Works, with instructions to take immediate measures to enforce the rights of the Crown. The solicitor would proceed with the utmost expedition, and if the hon. Member desired to discuss the question next Session nothing could more effectually further his object than to have the matters that were now pending decided in the meantime by a Court of Justice. It could not be said in that case that there could be no discussion, as the question was before a Court. Care would be taken that the gentlemen involved would have an opportunity of giving the explanations which the hon. Member desired. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that the proceedings would be pursued with the utmost energy and despatch.

INDIA—PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—ENGINEERING COLLEGE.—QUESTION.

MR. PLUNKET said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to establish an Engineering College for the preparation of candidates seeking employment in the Indian Public Works Department; and, if so, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to abandon or modify the present system of competitive examination for appointments in that department; and, whether it is intended to abolish the system of competitive examinations for the forest service in India?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the hon. Member I have to say that it is intended to establish an Engineering College to be entered by competitive examination, and that it is not intended to abolish the system of competition for our forest service in India.

UNITED STATES—FURTHER TREATY OF EXTRADITION.—QUESTION.

MR. STAPLETON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will be prepared, on the passing of the Extradition Bill, to negotiate with the United States for a further Treaty of Extradition, in which persons charged with embezzlement will be included, similar in character to the Treaty of Extradition between France and the United States?

MR. OTWAY said, in reply, that, as he was informed, embezzlement was included in the list of crimes in the Extradition Bill; but the Government would bear in mind the suggestion of his hon. Friend in case there should be any alteration in the Extradition Treaty between this country and the United States. There was, however, no immediate intention of proposing any.

METROPOLIS—GOVERNMENT OF LONDON LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Buxton), he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill next Session for the better government of London?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that before he answered that Question he might perhaps be allowed to make one or two observations. He did most earnestly desire, and he thought there was a reasonable expectation, that the Home Department would have somewhat more time for the consideration of its measures by the House next Session than it had had this Session. If such were the case, and he thought he might fairly assume that it would be, he held himself pledged to bring in, in the first place, a Licensing Bill and a Trades Union Bill—both of which subjects had been mentioned in the Queen's Speech—and, in addition, a Mines Regulation Bill, which for want of time, he had been unable to carry through Parliament in two successive Sessions. Among the other matters—and he was sorry to say they were numerous—which would require soon to be treated, one of the most important was that to which the Question of his hon. Friend referred—namely, the better government of the metropolis; but, important as it was, there were others hardly yielding to it in importance, and perhaps of still greater urgency. Among them was the condition of our rivers—a matter affecting not only the question of the supply of water, but also the sanitary arrangements of all our large towns. Next to that was another measure of very great importance, and forming the necessary complement of the Elementary Education Bill passed this year—he meant a complete revision of the Factories and Workshops Regulation Acts. Another question on which a Commission had been sitting for, he thought, the best part of two years was the Amendment of the Sanitary Acts; and among the further subjects requiring legislation were the Inclosure of Commons, County Finance Boards, the Turnpike Acts, the superannuation of the Police, and the Game Laws. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: And the Medical Acts Amendment.] That, he was happy to say, was not within his Department. He need not say that those measures alone would occupy the whole time of the House, and it was absolutely impossible, therefore, that he could do more than make a selection from them. It would be the business of the Government carefully to consider the contending claims of those various measures, and, with reference to the time which might be fairly allowed to the Home Department next Session, to say what Bills, and how many of them, could be dealt with; and he could assure his hon. Friend that the local government of London was a question which would have a foremost place in the consideration of those measures.

EXPEDITION TO OCEANICA.

QUESTION.

Mr. H. RICHARD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any foundation for the statement which appeared in one of Reuter's Telegrams, dated Madrid, June 24—

"That Spain, England, and Holland had decided to organize an expedition to Oceanica to put an end to piracy, the Spanish squadron being charged to explore the Sea of Yolo and the Philippine Islands?"

Mr. OTWAY said, in reply, that he was not aware of any expedition of that kind being contemplated.

BOARD OF TRADE, &c.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. MACFIE, who had given Notice to call attention to the constitution and working of the Board of Trade and other Administrative Departments; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the great commercial and national objects which Parliament has entrusted to the Board of Trade, and others which lie equally within the Board's legitimate sphere, would be furthered if, as in earlier periods of its history, the President and Secretary had, in discharging the numerous, diversified, and yearly enlarging functions of that important Department, the assistance of weighty and experienced assessors, such as might be selected by Her Majesty on account of their acquaintance with the various industrial interests of the Empire, from within and outside of Parliament, to act together as a duly constituted deliberative Board," said, he was unfortunate in having to bring that question forward in the absence of the respected and valued head of the Department to which it related, and also at the late period of the Session at which they had arrived. He believed it would be uncongenial to the House if he were now to propose his Motion, and that he would not be doing justice to the subject if he attempted it, because the opinion of the commercial Members of Parliament could not now be obtained. At the same time he wished very briefly to indicate what the proposal was which he had intended to lay before the House. It was utterly impossible that the Board of Trade, as at present constituted, could discharge all the duties that pertained to it. His proposal was that the President and Secretary should have the assistance of weighty and experienced assessors, such as might be selected by Her Majesty on account of their acquaintance with the various industrial interests of the Empire. Members of Parliament and gentlemen outside Parliament would give their services gratuitously. He would have several committees in the Department of Trade. He was convinced that such a system should sooner or later be introduced in the Colonial Department and in the Department of the Post Office, as well as in that of the Board of Trade. Having briefly stated what was the object of the Motion of which he had given Notice, he begged to say that he would not now move that Motion, but would postpone action in the matter till another Session.

MILITIA (IRELAND.)

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, a Return of the number of Militiamen, stating date, corps, county, offence, and punishment, who had been brought before either Magistrates at Petty Sessions or any Superior Court since 1865 charged with any agrarian or political offence in Ireland."
—(Mr. Stacpoole.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, without having any intention whatever of casting an imputation on the loyalty of the Irish Militia, he must, on the part of the Government, decline to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member. The Return was one which would take much time and cost a great deal of money, besides which it would not be possible to secure accuracy in such a Return. For all practical purposes the Return would be useless.

COLONEL FRENCH denied that the compiling of the Return would involve trouble, delay, or expense. There would be no difficulty in furnishing such a Return. He thought the Government acted unwisely in not embodying the Irish Militia. The Staff was kept up, but the rank and file of the force were allowed to dwindle away. He wished to know whether the Government had any reason for not calling out the Irish Militia regiments? In his opinion the hon. Member was entitled to the Return he asked for.

COLONEL BARTELOT observed that yesterday another Militia question had been passed over, in what he could not help regarding as rather unseemly haste. As the Secretary for War was not in his place he should not enter upon the question of the Militia further than to express a hope that the Government would avail themselves of the favourable opportunity now afforded them to place the Militia Force in a state of efficiency, both as regarded officers and arms. It would be a graceful act on the part of the Government to call out the Irish Militia, and to bring them over into this country.

MR. BRUCE reminded hon. Members that the question before the House was not whether it was expedient to call out the Irish Militia, but whether a certain Return, involving considerable delay and expense, should be granted. For the reasons already given he trusted that the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion, more especially as he had never heard any charge brought against the Irish Militia, such as the terms of the Motion would seem to imply had been alleged against them.

MR. EYKYN said, he was glad that the question of the Militia had been ventilated, even in this indirect manner. He trusted that the Militia regiments would be kept up to their full strength, and would be properly officered and armed. It would of course be very unwise to take any steps that might present the appearance of our being in a panic; but as the Militia was the force we looked to in times of peace, it might be placed upon a proper footing without leading to any improper inferences.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would be the last person to cast a slur upon the Irish Militia. His only object in moving for the Return was to show that they were entirely innocent of the charges that had been brought against them. He begged to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT APPROACHES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. HAVILAND-BURKE moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that, taking into consideration the late hours and heavy labours in connection with the duties of the Legislature, and the inconvenience and loss of time arising from the crowded state of the thoroughfares, Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that during the Session of Parliament Members of the Legislature may have free access to the Houses of Parliament by way of Constitution Hill to Birdcage Walk and through the Horse Guards.”

To open new thoroughfares would cause a large expenditure to be incurred; but by the method he proposed no outlay would have to be made.

MR. BRUCE said, there was a good deal to be said in favour of the proposal of the hon. Member; but it would be useless at this period of the Session to present an Address to Her Majesty, because it would be impossible for an answer to it to be returned. The hon. Member had better withdraw his Motion for the present, and renew it early next Session.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

NEUTRALITY OF BELGIUM.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he wished to make reference to what took place yesterday in the House with regard to the new Treaty. He should be unwilling to return to the constituency which he represented without saying a word upon that transaction; but what he had to say he said rather to relieve his own conscience than with the view of producing any effect elsewhere. The Prime Minister told them that the Government had placed the country under fresh obligations with regard to Continental Powers, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had eulogized the transaction, and had said the Government were adopting a wise and spirited policy.

Now, he had always found in the past that every policy which was characterized by Gentlemen in various parts of the House as spirited had not turned out to be wise. He had a very strong conviction that there was no wise policy for this House and for the Government of this country to pursue but that of keeping entirely free from Continental entanglements. He believed the Government was sincerely anxious to keep the peace, and that the course they had taken with regard to this new Treaty had been with a view to the promotion of that object. But, as it was so contrary to what he believed to be a sound policy for this country to pursue, he was personally wholly opposed to it. The Prime Minister of France a short time ago told the world that he went to war with a light heart. It appeared to him that there were a great many men in that House and out of it who could enter upon a Continental quarrel with a light heart, if he might judge from the manner in which they had spoken on various occasions. He could not imagine anything more grave or disastrous than for this country, on any pretext whatever, to enter upon a Continental war. Since he had been in that House nothing had struck him more than the debates with regard to the pauperism of the country and the burdens upon the class who had to support that pauperism; and when he heard men talk lightly of going to war, he remembered that we had more than 1,000,000 paupers, and that we had 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 who had to assist in supporting those paupers, though they had themselves no more than the bare necessities of life. The conditions on which our prosperity was based were wholly different from those which were to be found in connection with any other country. If a wall were built round France or round Germany each of those countries could live though nothing went out of it or nothing came into it. They produced enough for their people's food; but, as we had to obtain elsewhere a large proportion of what was consumed in this country, it was far more serious for us to enter into a war than for any other country that could be named. Besides, the British Empire extended over the whole globe, and if we were to enter into a Continental war it would be felt in Canada, on the shores of Asia and Africa, and in Australia.

Mr. Jacob Bright

He could never, therefore, speak lightly of such a possibility. He hoped the day would come when the men who met in that House would feel that their duties were confined to wise legislation for the people, and the defence of British possessions and British interests. He was as willing as any man to give his voice and vote for the protection of that which belonged to us; but he protested against Quixotic expeditions, involving this country in difficulties from which it was often difficult to escape. He did not think any Government had a right to subject the country to greater obligations, or to incur any risk of Continental war, without the opportunity being afforded for some general expression of opinion on the part of the constituencies. He did not believe he should live to see the day when any Prime Minister who was at once remarkable for intelligence and conscience would, under any pretext do anything that would involve the country in a Continental war. To put himself in order he moved the adjournment of the House.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, in seconding the Motion, expressed his regret that the Prime Minister had not been able to give them more explicit information about the Treaty, and said they ought to be put in possession of such information as soon as possible. He felt considerable apprehension from the statement made by the Prime Minister last night. It was true we entered into a Treaty in 1839; but there were a variety of opinions as to the extent to which we were bound by it; and many good authorities held that we were only bound collectively, and not separately, to interfere in the affairs of Belgium. As he understood the statement of the Prime Minister, this new arrangement bound us far more absolutely than did the old one to interfere in the affairs of Belgium, and it bound us in a very extraordinary manner, for it seemed to him we were to confine our operations to defending Belgium, and that we were not to go any further. If we went to war at all he would have us "go the whole hog." He should not perform his duty without saying that he felt much alarmed by the statement of the Prime Minister that the Government were entering into new obligations, as regarded Continental affairs, and without protesting in the strongest manner against any new en-agement which could complicate us in the wretched Continental quarrel now going on.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he respected the courage of his hon. Friends as he respected the courage of the minority of 5 in the Division of the other day; but, as a Radical and an Economist, he would venture to say a word on the other side. He had seen nothing of levity in the spirit with which the prospect of war had been contemplated, either in the House or in the country. Foreigners had been spoken of as if they were peculiar human beings, always ready to rush at each other's throats, uninfluenced by the elevated motives which actuated the great British people; but we should do more justice to foreigners if we regarded them as human beings and nations actuated by the same desires and feelings as ourselves; as struggling for a freedom which we had happily attained, and for an independence which we enjoyed: and if people abroad were fighting for independence and freedom, they were fighting our battle too. If his hon. Friends spoke for the "peace at any price" party, he would go beyond them, and say he was for peace at any price, even at the price of war. As to speaking of the defence of the country, where were you to draw the line of defence? If we were in any danger of being attacked, it was the greatest absurdity to sit still with our hands before us, and to make no preparations. That was not the way to insure peace; it was the way to make war probable. During this war we had been so anxious to take neither side that the result had been to hide from ourselves that which we ought to know—namely, that the war arose because the chief of the most warlike nation in Europe held his position under conditions which required him from time to time to distract the attention of his own subjects by a war with foreign countries. The House did not know enough of the Treaty proposed by Her Majesty's Government to pronounce a positive opinion upon it; but he thought they had done well to stand by a smaller nation whose existence had been threatened. If a woman or a child were attacked by a ruffian in the street, would his hon. Friends keep safely in-doors, deaf to screams for help, and declaring that they would interfere in no such quarrels? In his opinion, the Government had taken a wise and spirited course in endeavouring to uphold the independence of Belgium.

MR. RYLANDS said, his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) had asked us to consider foreign nations as being actuated by elevated motives not less than the British people; but if that were so, what right had he to assume that any foreign Power would act the part of freebooters, and would, without provocation or justification, attempt to ravage our shores? On what ground did he assume that this country was in danger of being attacked by any foreign Power? The House had no right to assume that either France or Prussia had the slightest idea of attacking us, nor was it reasonable for the Government to act as though those Powers would take such a course as would render special measures of defence necessary on our part. Even if it were so, however, were not France and Prussia in a far better position to attack us before the war than now when they were fighting each other? Something had been said about panic, and there appeared to be a panic in that House, judging from the manner in which, night after night, hon. Members had got up in their places to put all kinds of Questions respecting the state of the defences of the country. It seemed as though their usual calmness and coolness had deserted them in the belief that we were in danger of invasion. And now after all our experience of the worthlessness of foreign Treaties we were about to be involved in another. It was only the other night that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tamworth (Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer), whose distinguished position gave him great authority on these subjects, had told them of a remarkable circumstance which had naturally excited considerable attention in the country. His right hon. Friend had said that before the ink with which the Treaty of 1831 guaranteeing Belgium was signed was hardly dry, there was a negotiation between the French and Prussian Ambassadors of that day to break its conditions. And just recently there was the proposed Secret Treaty between France and Prussia which had been brought to light not by diplomatists, but by the Press, and which gave us the right to say, notwithstanding every denial and explanation, that the course pursued by France and Prussia was open to grave suspicion. But according to the Prime Minister, the Government had practically given up a Treaty under which the independence of Belgium was guaranteed by the five great Powers, for a separate Treaty with the two very Powers whose agents so recently had been negotiating an infraction of the former Treaty. It appeared that under the terms of the new Treaty if one of the belligerents were crushed and its military forces destroyed, we were to fight alongside that crushed Power, against the victorious Power, should the latter invade Belgium. That was not a satisfactory position. The hon. Member for Leicester seemed to think we ought to defend every small and independent State against aggression: why, then, did we not interfere on behalf of Schleswig-Holstein, of Hanover, and the Duchies and Archduchies which were crushed out of existence by Prussia and by Italy? Did those Sovereigns not excite the sympathies of his hon. Friend? [Mr. P. A. TAYLOR: Certainly not.] No; he was perfectly well aware that his hon. Friend rejoiced at the downfall of those petty sovereignties; but that was entirely inconsistent with his argument, as those were small and independent States very much in the position of Belgium. He (Mr. Rylands) did not wish to raise the question as to what this country ought to do in the event of Belgium being attacked. There was really no danger of Belgium being attacked, and he thought the question of the independence of that country ought to be left till the eventuality arose, and Her Majesty's Government ought not to be induced by all this clamour about Belgium to take a step which placed us at so serious a disadvantage. As far as he could judge, the new Treaty was a foolish Treaty, and he must express his deep regret that after all the misfortunes brought upon us by our Continental engagements, the Government should be negotiating another Treaty which might be disadvantageous to this country. It was to be regretted that under our constitutional arrangements there was no power in the House to discuss the provisions of a Treaty until they were carried into effect. It was unfortunate that in the secret recesses of the Foreign Office, Treaties should be hatched, by which the Government bound not only this but future generations, under circumstances which he feared might at a future time result in some great and terrible disaster. He could not say that he thought the eventuality contemplated by the present Treaty was likely to occur; but if it did occur, and if we were called upon to defend Belgium by allying ourselves with a crushed Power against an army and a nation flushed with victory and conquest; if in the interest of the 4,000,000 of the population of Belgium, our own 30,000,000 of people were involved in all the horrors, privations, and sufferings of a protracted war, then he ventured to say that the authors of this Treaty would be condemned in the page of history, and the evil results of their present action would blot out all the good which had been done up to this period by Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BRUCE said, he hoped that the debate would not be further prolonged. It was extremely inconvenient to discuss such a subject in the absence of the Prime Minister, and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as well as in the absence of Members of the Opposition, with only one or two exceptions. An opportunity would be offered for the discussion of the new Treaty to-morrow, when his right hon. Friend would be present, and in the meantime he did not consider it expedient on the part of the Government to enter into the discussion. In reference to a remark of the last speaker as to a general disregard of Treaties, he desired to point out that there was a great difference between Treaties just entered into and those which had been greatly modified by events that had occurred since they were concluded. He believed the conduct of the Government in regard to the new Treaty was eminently calculated to maintain the independence of Belgium, and to preserve the country from the horrors of war. It was from no "lightness of heart," but with a sincere desire of the Government to do their duty, to preserve the honour of this country, and to avoid war, that the Treaty had been proposed; and he could assure the House that it was not hatched "in the secret recesses of the Foreign Office;" but that it was adopted on the full responsibility of the Government, acting in accordance with what they believed to be the almost unanimous desire of the country.

Mr. Rylands

SIR HENRY LYTTON BULWER said, he did not reply to the remarks of his hon. Friends below the Gangway, because he quite concurred with the Home Secretary that in the absence of the Premier and of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) this was not the time for discussing the new Treaty. At the same time, he did think it exceedingly desirable that before the House separated there should be some further opportunity of discussing the Treaty, which was at present very imperfectly known to Members.

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought that an opportunity ought to be given to the House to express its opinion on the present conjuncture of affairs, or else it would have no opportunity of speaking at all. During the last 20 years the country had spent nearly £400,000,000—about half the amount of the National Debt—to place and to preserve the country in security, and the House ought to have an opportunity of knowing whether, in case of our being involved in war, proper provision had been made for the public security. The Government had promised to preserve neutrality; but the policy they had hitherto acted upon had operated in favour of France. Lord Russell had once laid it down as a principle that the only foreign policy that England was called upon to recognize, or that she had ever recognized, was one which was calculated to promote civil and religious liberty throughout Europe, which meant the maintenance of Protestantism. But Protestantism was in danger as long as they allowed the Jesuits to exercise their machinations. All the wars that had desolated Europe of late years were attributable to the action of the Jesuits. He regretted the absence of the Prime Minister, and hoped that the Government would be able to satisfy the House that the policy the Executive proposed to follow would prove satisfactory.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Jacob Bright,)—put, and negatived.

MR. BRUCE moved the adjournment of the House.

House at rising to adjourn till To-morrow, at half after Twelve o'clock.

NEUTRALITY OF BELGIUM—TREATY WITH FRANCE AND PRUSSIA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CAIRNS, who had given Notice, to inquire of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any further progress has been made in concluding the Treaty with France and Prussia as to the neutrality of Belgium; and, whether Her Majesty's Government can state the text of the Treaty?—said: My Lords, I was anxious yesterday to put the Question which stands in my name on the Paper for to-day, but I was prevented doing so by the absence of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to whom I had been unable to give Notice in consequence of the early hour at which your Lordships met on that day. Your Lordships listened with great interest and attention to the statement made by the noble Earl on Monday night. I think I may answer for both sides of the House that as to a great part of that statement it was a satisfaction to your Lordships to receive the information contained in it. I cannot—although any approval on my part must be of little consequence—withhold my expression of approval at the object which Her Majesty's Government had in view in the negotiations in which they have been engaged—an object which has put an end to any doubts, if such could exist, that they are prepared to maintain the engagements of the Treaty of 1839—engagements which do not concern the honour more than they concern the interests of England. There is also, I think, no doubt that of all ways, that most calculated to avoid the dire necessity of war is to announce at the very commencement the intention of the Government on a matter of this kind—to allow it to be known that this country is determined to adhere to her engagements, and will treat any violation of the engagements of the other signatories, parties to the Treaty of 1839, as a just and proper cause of war. Having said this, I must go a little further, and express to your Lordships frankly and briefly some considerations which have occurred to me with reference to the new engagement which has been proposed—considerations which to my mind appear to point to seeds of very considerable embarrassment and possible complication arising out of that engagement. Now, the signatories of the Treaty of 1839, putting aside Belgium, were five in number, and those five engaged, in words which are familiar to your Lordships, to maintain and defend the neutrality of Belgium. Two of those signatories are most unfortunately now engaged in war, and apprehensions are entertained that—whatever may be the intentions of those Governments at the present time—the pressure of events, whether they desire it or not, may lead one of them, or, as has been suggested in the past few weeks, both of them, to forget the engagements of the Treaty of 1839, and to compromise or violate the neutrality of Belgium. Under these circumstances, that which would have been the natural course for this country to pursue is so obvious that I certainly think strong reasons ought to be given for departing from it. By the natural and obvious course, I mean the course which would have been taken if the Government of this country had made known—not by way of menace, but of information—to the two belligerent Powers that we bore in mind and were not unobservant of the obligations of the Treaty of 1839—that we were prepared to maintain those obligations, and that we should oppose any attempt of either or both of them to violate those obligations. And, at the same time that this information was conveyed, the natural course would have been to enter into communications with the remaining signatories of the Treaty who are not engaged in war—namely, the Court of St. Petersburg and the Court of Vienna—to inform them of the communication we had made to the belligerents, and to endeavour to arrange with them for an united course of action in contingencies that might arise. I cannot imagine that this course would have occasioned any delay greater than that necessary to accomplish an engagement such as is now proposed—I cannot imagine that it would have required more time to communicate with Russia and Austria than with France and Berlin. Nor can I see that the course I have indicated would have carried with it any threat or appearance of menace. The statement would have been made not to one of the belligerent Powers alone, but to both. It would not have assumed that there was any intention to disregard the obligations of the Treaty of 1839. It would have simply proceeded upon the natural assumption that when there was a war-like conflagration raging round a small protected territory, events might happen which would require the obligations of the Treaty of 1839 to be borne in mind and enforced. An obvious advantage, too, would have arisen from such a course. England and the two other neutral Powers, acting together, would have been free from any possibility of suspicion of siding with or favouring either of the belligerents. They would have stood aloof as neutral Powers, prepared to do no more than maintain the obligations of the Treaty by which they were bound, and they would not have been chargeable under any circumstances with the inconvenience of entering into fresh and new engagements with either or both of the belligerent Powers. That being, as I venture to think, the natural course which matters should have taken, allow me to state very briefly what I have termed the elements of danger that I cannot help foreseeing in the engagement which is proposed. In the first place, the arrangement, as we are given to understand it, is this—that, in the event of the violation of the neutrality of Belgium by one of the belligerents, we are to engage ourselves to co-operate with the other belligerent, and the other belligerent is to engage to co-operate with us. I do not forget the limit or proviso, which I will refer to in a moment; but at first sight we are engaged to make common cause in that contingency with one of the belligerents. We thereupon cease to maintain in any sense the position of a neutral Power, or that of a neutral Power engaged merely in defence of the neutrality of Belgium; we become identified in the eye of the other belligerent and in the eye of the country of the other belligerent as allied with the first belligerent, with all the traditions and all the consequences which arise from taking part with one of two highly excited nations. We join that one nation, and I fear we leave behind that act on our part a train of bitter memories which it might require a great length of time to efface. If I mention the names of one or other of the countries to which I refer, I hope it will not be supposed that I am anticipating on the part of one or of the other any actual violation of the Treaty of 1839; but supposing such a thing were to happen—suppose the Treaty were to be violated by France, we become bound to take part with Prussia—we are arrayed in arms with Prussia in this great contest against France. Now, do you suppose that in such case, the French people, intelligent and ingenious as they are, will carefully discriminate and bear in mind the fact, that we allied with Prussia merely to defend the neutrality of Belgium, and that they will not look upon us as partners with Prussia, and as making common cause with it to all intents and purposes? If, on the other hand, the violator of the Treaty be Prussia, and we are to unite with France, do you suppose that the people of Germany, who are at this moment showing themselves eager enough to watch the least symptom of a departure from neutrality on our part, would discriminate as to the object and purposes for which we unite with France, and that they will not look upon us simply as allies of France in a war against themselves, and that all the traditions and all the train of angry memories which such a course naturally excites will not arise? More than this. In the position which I have attempted to describe there is an end to all power on the part of England to interpose at any part of the contest and say—"Our only object is to protect the neutrality of Belgium. We have no interest in the war." On the contrary, England would have become to all intents and purposes one of the belligerents, and counsels or suggestions of that kind from us would be extremely unlikely to be listened to. I will go further. I said I had not forgotten the proviso as to the extent to which we are to co-operate with the other belligerent Power in the event of the neutrality of Belgium being violated by one of them. The arrangement, as I understand, is that if one of the belligerents should violate the neutrality of Belgium we should engage to join the other, but should not be bound to co-operate with the other for the general purposes of the war. Now, I ask, how a co-operation of that kind could possibly happen?—how the co-operation of England could be limited in its extent and ambit to the mere object of maintaining the neutrality of Belgium, and could be prevented from going beyond that, and to the general operations of the war? Look at the position of the two co-operating Powers, England and the belligerent which she will join. Their objects will be as different as any two objects can be. The object of England will be to interpose to maintain the neutrality of Belgium and there stop. The object of the belligerent which she will join will be altogether different. It will be to humble, to strike at its enemy, to inflict the most serious blow which could be inflicted upon the other belligerent with which it was engaged in a death struggle. What would be the consequences? You would have two Powers co-operating with different and antagonistic objects. You would have them at constant variance as to whether any particular strategic operation was required—whether it was all that was required for the preservation of the neutrality of Belgium, or whether it did not go beyond such preservation of neutrality and launch out into some general object of the war.

You would have divided counsels, antagonistic schemes—you would have that which would be of all things that can be supposed fatal to the harmony of the two co-operating Powers, and disastrous to the accomplishment of any good result from that co-operation. Then I go further. If England were to interpose alone, or interpose in union with the two other neutral Powers, Austria and Russia, and to interpose merely for the purpose of maintaining the engagements of the Treaty of 1839, you would have—I will not say, a very strong prospect, but, at all events, a reasonable prospect of localizing any war which unfortunately might become necessary—you would have some prospect of confining military operations, first, to the purpose in view—namely, to protect Belgium, and next to the locality which was principally concerned, the locality immediately contiguous to Belgium. But the moment you go beyond this and enter into an engagement to join one of the belligerents in a course of operations which it has in hand, it becomes necessary that the other belligerent, for its own defence—for its own success in the war in which it is engaged, should treat England so joining its antagonist as a Power which it must strike at, which it must humble; upon which, if possible, it must inflict an injury in every part of the world where an injury can be inflicted upon this country. So that, in place of any chance of localizing the struggle, you of necessity extend its limits to whatever part of the world English power and English dominion may reach. The next observation I have to make is this. Since England, in case of the violation of the neutrality of Belgium by one belligerent, is to join the other, you make it the object of each belligerent to obtain the alliance of England, and its co-operation against its rival. The co-operation of England is to depend on the simple fact of the violation of the neutrality of Belgium. Now, I can conceive nothing more likely than that a skilful politician, or an ingenious strategist, would be able without very great difficulty so to arrange matters on behalf of one of the belligerent Powers that it would become absolutely necessary for the other belligerent to commit some act which would be a violation of that neutrality; and then, the moment that that act was done,

the co-operation of England is secured to that belligerent who has caused and necessitated the very act of which we complain. I ask your Lordships what would be the effect on public opinion in this country if anything of the kind occurred? Suppose one of the belligerents, by this ingenuity—which I think would not be very difficult—succeeded in making it necessary for the other belligerent, for the sake of its own preservation, to do some act which would be a violation of the neutrality of Belgium; and suppose the people of this country should see, as they certainly would, that the real offender was not the belligerent who actually and mechanically violated the neutrality, but the other, who made that act necessary; what would the country say if it found the Government engaging us in a war on behalf of and in co-operation with that belligerent which was morally the guilty party in the transaction? The next observation I have to make is this—the engagement seems to me to be one entirely useless. If both the belligerents should violate the neutrality of Belgium, it would have no operation. If, on the other hand, only one violates the neutrality, and if we are to engage in hostile operations in consequence of that act, we should always, without the least difficulty, without any previous engagements, be perfectly sure of securing the co-operation of the other if we should wish for it, and if the terms upon which we should be willing to accept it were agreed upon between us. Hence it is useless in the one case and superfluous in the other. Then I ask your Lordships to consider what effect it may have upon the acts and engagements of Russia and Austria. If the neutrality of Belgium should be violated, and if this country should assert—as it would assert—the engagements of the Treaty of 1839, and if we then applied to Austria and Russia to join us, I can quite well understand that we might expect to secure their co-operation for the purpose of maintaining engagements to which they were bound as well as ourselves. But enter into an arrangement of this kind—let the same thing be attempted, and appeal to Austria to join us in enforcing the Treaty. I can understand Austria replying—“We admit that we are bound by the Treaty of 1839, and we should have been very glad to co-operate with you in maintaining its obligations; but you have entered into another engagement, in consequence of which"—supposing France was the violator—"you have agreed to co-operate with Germany, and now you are about to enforce the engagements of the Treaty of 1839 in co-operation with Germany. We should be quite willing to co-operate with you if you acted, as we should act, simply as neutrals in the quarrel; but if you are going to co-operate with Prussia we decline to act upon that policy, and we therefore will not give our adhesion." I gathered from the statement of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that a communication had been made to Austria and Russia, and that, though no formal answer had been obtained, such communications as we have had were satisfactory. Now, I have no doubt Austria and Russia will not think it necessary to protest against this arrangement; but it is one thing to abstain from protesting—it is one thing to use civil expressions with regard to it—it is another thing to say—"We tell you distinctly that we shall not allow this engagement in any way to interfere with our obligation to co-operate with you, if you desire it, in maintaining the Treaty of 1839." I will not say more than that I greatly fear there are at this part of the case the seeds of difficulty which possibly may lead other Powers to take a different view of the obligations of 1839 than they would otherwise have done. I have now, with a brevity befitting the day and hour, pointed out—I hope in no spirit of criticism beyond that which my sense of duty makes me feel necessary—the doubts which I entertain with regard to the Treaty. I desire to repeat most amply, however, my great pleasure at the object which the Government had in view, and the spirit they showed in undertaking this fresh engagement. The difficulties I feel are as to the mode in which it has been done, not as to the object for which it has been done; and I shall be very glad if the text of the Treaty will remove any of those difficulties. For my own part, there is nothing I should hear with greater pleasure from the noble Earl, whose answer I cannot anticipate, than that circumstances had arisen which prevented the consummation of this fresh engagement. If, however, the difficulties I feel are not removed by the text of the Treaty, and if the engagement is one which is actually to be consummated, I can only express a further wish, in which I am sure your Lordships, whatever you may think of what I have said, will all agree with me—that wish is, that circumstances may never arise which will render it necessary for these engagements to be put in operation.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have heard the speech of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) with a feeling of very great relief. I expected—and my expectations have certainly been justified—that he would speak with that reserve and fairness towards the Government on a great international question which he was likely to exhibit on such an occasion; but I knew also that, with regard to the particular form of the proposal, every possible objection to it would be exhausted by the ability and the skill of the noble and learned Lord, and I am much relieved at finding what those objections seem to be. The noble and learned Lord very fairly stated what course ought, in his judgment, to have been pursued by Her Majesty's Government. He said we should have entered into no engagement whatever, but have declared, without any menace to the belligerents, our determination to maintain the neutrality of Belgium. Now, I ventured the other day, with regard to the question of menace, to say that I believed the form in which we had put it was less menacing and less offensive to those Powers than any other way in which it could have been put. I will venture to explain my meaning. It is mainly a matter as to form, and not as to substance—because if there were a difference of substance I should own we had put ourselves in the wrong. It is sometimes useful to compare the action of nations and that of individuals, and very often the conduct of a high-spirited nation and of an honourable man is very much the same. I will suppose that one of your Lordships found two persons about to engage in a duel, and at once declared to them both the obligation he would feel under to strike the one who took an unfair part in that duel. I believe that would be regarded by both as an imputation upon their intentions, and might almost encourage them to do that which otherwise they would have thought wrong by being precluded from doing it by menace. But if, instead of that, the third person says to each—"You say, as I have every reason to believe, you mean to fight without any unfair play whatever; but you express a suspicion that fair play will not be exhibited by the person with whom you are engaged in hostilities. If it is any pleasure to you that I should agree with you to strike your opponent if he begins unfair play, I will do so; but, mind, this is a bargain which I must offer to the other equally." I believe that exactly in proportion as they were confident of their own good faith and suspicious of the bad faith of their opponent they would accept, as France and Prussia have accepted, the proposal so made to them. The noble and learned Lord says we ought, without menace, to have told them what we were going to do, and then, he says, you should have strengthened yourselves by going to the other great Powers parties to the guarantee of 1839; and this, he says, would have strengthened our position. Now, the facts as they have happened show that the course which he suggests would not have been successful. I stated the other day that we had received the most friendly assurances from both Russia and Austria. Now, it is rather curious that we have since received from Austria her distinct readiness to agree to our proposal, supposing that France and Prussia do not object to sign the Treaty. So that with regard to Austria we have exactly secured the very promise and consent to our proposal which she would not have given to a single menace on our part. From Russia we have received the most friendly assurances; but there is certainly a disinclination on the part of Russia to accede to this proposal; because Russia considers, and says that the original Treaty binds them, and they would wish to have an understanding of a much wider description—on the merits of which I do not now say one word, one way or the other, but which understanding would certainly bring us under obligations we do not hold at this moment. Russia would, therefore, in the same manner, have refused simply and solely to join us in a single menace with regard to the neutrality of Belgium. These facts show that the course advocated by the noble and learned Lord would not have been the most judicious one. But then he says we put ourselves in a great difficulty if the case should arise. Now, I cannot help again pointing out to your Lordships that, being bound by the obligations of that Treaty, we must, if the contingency arises, act upon those obligations. We are not now in a position like that described by a Conservative Government, when we joined in a Treaty guaranteeing Luxemburg, and when, almost before the ink with which it was signed was dry, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister of this country announced, to the surprise of France and the indignation of Prussia, that we had signed it as a collective guarantee, and that as the co-operation of the other Powers was the only case in which the guarantee could possibly be brought into question, England had brought itself under no new obligation at all. I admit that there is this disadvantage about the present engagement, that if the contingency should arise—which God forbid!—and which I do not believe will arise—we should be obliged to act upon our engagements. Being, however, so obliged, I cannot conceive that it would not be an enormous advantage to have a Power with 500,000 or 600,000 soldiers co-operating with our Army and fleet. The noble and learned Lord has made a most ingenious supposition—one very much like a game of chess I have seen, where a very superior player tells his adversary he will force him again and again not to be checkmated, but to checkmate himself. I could hardly understand why the noble and learned Lord did not describe what the ingenious scheme was that should enable one belligerent to force the other to commit that particular outrage which would necessarily increase the forces of his enemy by the power, the wealth, and the public spirit of such a country as that to which we belong. I take it that if either army were driven by a defeat to the frontier of Belgium, and obliged for their own safety to seek shelter there, it would be no violation of neutrality, for if they submitted to be disarmed there would be absolutely no infraction of the neutrality which they had guaranteed. The noble and learned Lord says we might be driven into war by the action of either one or both the belligerents. Now, I think I have stated enough to show that even if either of them were not restrained by the fear of this country, the fear of this country joining with their enemy would certainly prevent them from taking a step of that character. It is a case I should hardly have put had it not been suggested—though, I admit, in very courteous terms—by the noble and learned Lord to both those nations; but suppose, he says, both violate the neutrality, that absolves us from the obligations of the Treaty, and it then falls to the ground. It would certainly place us in one of the most awkward positions I could possibly conceive; but I really think that, right as it is to look with suspicion in the interests of our own country upon all possible designs of any other country, for us to fear that two Powers, after a solemn renewal of an engagement such as this, binding on the personal honour of the Emperor of the French and the King of Prussia, should, within a very few months, in the face of the whole world, desert such an engagement, requires too strong an effort of the imagination. I am quite sure, my Lords, that this Treaty, which has for its principal object the neutrality and independence of Belgium, is likely to be effectual, and will prevent the occurrence of that particular event which would be most disagreeable and most entangling to Great Britain. As to this instrument in the slightest degree weakening the effect of the previous Treaty of 1839, I entirely deny it. There is an express reservation of that Treaty; and, besides that, as I mentioned the other day, there is an exact precedent to this case. The seventh Article of the General Treaty of Paris, of March 30, 1856, between England, France, Austria, Italy, Prussia, and Russia, stipulates as follows—I am afraid I must read it in French, as I have no other copy by me—

“Leurs Majestés s’engagent, chacune de son côté, à respecter l’indépendance et l’intégrité territoriale de l’Empire Ottoman; garantissent en commun la stricte observation de cet engagement, et considèrent en conséquence tout acte de nature à y porter atteinte comme une question d’intérêt général.”

But a fortnight after this, without any event of importance having intervened, England, Austria, and France signed, on the 16th of April following a separate treaty, by the first Article of which—

“Les Hautes Parties contractantes garantissent solidairement entre elles l’indépendance et l’intégrité de l’Empire Ottoman conservés par le Traité conclu à Paris 30 Mars, 1856.”

This, I say, is a most complete precedent, and justifies us in saying that the Treaty now almost concluded does not in the slightest degree weaken the guarantee, whatever that may be, which was given by the Treaty of 1839. There is one point on which I have heard some objection, though the good sense of the noble and learned Lord induced him, I presume, to reject it—which is that the way in which we have acted is a disrespect to Belgium and almost an infraction of her independence. Now, if so, I admit that it was done after consideration and advisedly. We thought that in the very delicate and difficult situation of so small a country between two such powerful belligerents, having once asserted her intention to maintain her neutrality and independence, and having received assurance from both parties that that neutrality and independence should not be violated, it was better for her not to put forward proposals, risking refusals from one or both of the belligerents—refusals which would not have signified to a great country like ours, but might be extremely awkward for a small country like Belgium. As soon as the negotiations had reached a certain point, I officially informed the Belgian Government of the course I had pursued and the character of what had been done. I further pointed out that in the draft Treaty I have avoided bringing in her name, but said they would understand that all was intended to be done in practical harmony with Belgium, that we should count upon her support, and that our sole object was the independence and neutrality of that country. Your Lordships will see that at all events the Belgian Government has felt no resentment at what has been done by the few eloquent words used by the King at the opening of the Belgian Chambers, and by the enthusiastic reception which those words met from all parties. I trust that this Treaty will not come into effect. I believe it will not. But as far as it has gone, and as far as the judgment of Her Majesty’s Government is concerned, we thought it the best manner of preventing that great difficulty which has excited so much alarm and anxiety both in this country and to foreign nations.

LORD CAIRNS: The noble Earl has not stated what progress has been made with the Treaty, and whether he can give its text.

EARL GRANVILLE: The Treaty with Prussia was signed by Count Bernstorff and myself yesterday, and I was also informed yesterday by the French Ambassador that he had authority to sign as soon as the full powers arrived. I have not the slightest objection to read the text. Of course I read only one Treaty, as the other, mutatis mutandis, is identical with it—

“DRAFT OF TREATY BETWEEN ENGLAND AND “PRUSSIA RESPECTING BELGIUM.

“Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of Prussia, being desirous at the present time of recording in a solemn act their fixed determination to maintain the independence and neutrality of Belgium, as provided in the VIIth Article of the Treaty signed at London on the 19th of April, 1839, between Belgium and the Netherlands, which Article was declared by the Quintuple Treaty of 1839 to be considered as having the same force and value as if textually inserted in the said Quintuple Treaty, their said Majesties have determined to conclude between themselves a separate Treaty, which, without impairing or invalidating the conditions of the said Quintuple Treaty, shall be subsidiary and accessory to it; and they have accordingly named as their Plenipotentiaries for that purpose, that is to say:—

“Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c.

“And His Majesty the King of Prussia, &c.

“Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following Articles:—

“Art. I. His Majesty the King of Prussia having declared that, notwithstanding the hostilities in which the North German Confederation is now engaged with France, it is his fixed determination to respect the neutrality of Belgium so long as the same shall be respected by France; Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, on her part, declares that if during the said hostilities the armies of France should violate that neutrality, she will be prepared to co-operate with His Prussian Majesty for the defence of the same in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon, employing for that purpose her naval and military forces to insure its observance; and to maintain, in conjunction with His Prussian Majesty, then and thereafter, the independence and neutrality of Belgium.

“It is clearly understood that Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland does not engage herself by this Treaty to take part in any of the general operations of the war now carried on between the North German Confederation and France beyond the limits of Belgium as defined in the Treaty between Belgium and the Netherlands of April 19, 1839.

“Art. II. His Majesty the King of Prussia agrees on his part, in the event provided for in the foregoing Article, to co-operate with Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, employing his naval and military forces for the purpose aforesaid; and, the case arising, to concert with Her Majesty the measures which shall be taken, separately or in common, to secure the neutrality and independence of Belgium.

“Art. III. This Treaty shall be binding on the High Contracting Parties during the continuance of the present war between the North German Confederation and France, and for twelve months after the ratification of any Treaty of Peace concluded between those parties; and on the expiration of that time the independence and neutrality of Belgium will, so far as the High Contracting Parties are respectively concerned, continue to rest as heretofore on the 1st Article of the Quintuple Treaty of the 19th of April, 1839.

Art. IV. The present Treaty shall be ratified.”

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE: I wish, my Lords, to say a few words upon this important subject—and few they must be, in the present most critical state of affairs, and when Parliament is on the very brink of Prorogation. My excuse for speaking at all at such a moment is the connection I have held during many years with questions like that which is now under consideration. As far as I can judge from hearing the text of the intended Treaty read casually, as one may say, by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, care seems to have been taken to avoid any of the risks and embarrassments pointed out by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns). It is not my intention to enter into the comparative merits of the plans adopted by Her Majesty's Government, and that which the noble and learned Lord would have preferred. What strikes me as manifest is that we are greatly indebted to the Government for the care they have taken to meet the requirements of the honour and interest of the country by redeeming the pledges which were given in the Treaty of April, 1839, at the same time that they have endeavoured to guard us from the danger of being eventually involved in the horrors and calamities of war. I must be allowed, however, to take a more comprehensive view of the matter. To anyone who looks beyond passing circumstances to the whole extent and results of the war, considerations may readily occur which it would be well to bear in mind. I cannot doubt that, while standing to our guarantee of Belgian independence and neutrality without prejudice to our desire of remaining at peace, it is the object of Her Majesty's Ministers no less than the feeling of the country that we should keep in our hands as far as possible the means of limiting the range and continuance of the war, and of tendering our mediation with good effect whenever the opportunity occurs. Supposing that either of the two great parties now opposed to each other should obtain an ascendancy dangerous to the balance of power in Europe, and even to the very existence of some independent States, it would surely be desirable that our position should be such as to offer a limit to the excessive pretensions of victory. Now, I conceive, that with such purposes in view, Her Majesty's Government would have found it advantageous to communicate with Austria and Russia before they committed themselves to any decided course of proceeding. What, in fact, was their position with respect to the Treaty when all hopes of peace between the two opponents had ceased? There were five parties to the engagement which declared and guaranteed the neutrality of Belgium. Two of them—namely, France and Prussia—are belligerents; the other three—Great Britain, Austria, and Russia—are neutrals. Each belligerent gave formal assurance to Belgium that he would respect its neutrality, provided it were respected by the other. The King of the Belgians declared on his side that he would maintain his neutrality with all the force at his disposal. So far all was satisfactory. England and the other two neutral guarantees remained. Here I must confess that in my very humble opinion it would have been better, looking to the contingencies of war, if an attempt had been made to unite our own plain course of duty with that which seemed to devolve equally upon Austria and Russia. In this manner we might have kept clear of whatever risks and inconveniences may possibly arise in carrying out the new Treaty, and also, perhaps, have laid the foundation of a more complete understanding with both those Powers as to offers of mediation at any convenient juncture, and also as to the means of preserving Europe from any great and dangerous disturbance of its present settlement at the close of the war. It appears that there would have been little or no difficulty in making such an arrangement. Austria, we are told, has already consented to adopt the provisions of the Treaty; and Russia, although not yet quite up to the same mark, has shown, as I understand from the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), her good disposition in the matter. The proposal which I should have been glad to see made to those Powers might have assumed a very simple form. Its terms need only have expressed a joint recognition of their duty to maintain the neutrality of Belgium in every fitting emergency, to the full extent of their available means. Such a declaration could not possibly have given any offence—certainly, no just offence—to either of the belligerents, for it would have been nothing more than the complement of what they had themselves declared, in virtue of those long-standing engagements to which both they and the neutral signatories of the London Treaty were parties. Other neutral Powers of less magnitude might, in due season, have rallied round this point of union, and helped to give motives of moderation to that belligerent whose eventual triumph in arms might naturally enough suggest extravagant conditions of peace. In submitting these impressions to your Lordships, I beg to disclaim all intention of casting blame upon Her Majesty's Government. The view which I have taken of the question may be altogether erroneous; but I thought that, as Parliament was to be immediately prorogued, it might not be unseasonable for those who have been personally conversant with matters of this kind to express an opinion in public, and I trust, my Lords, that you will kindly forgive this brief intrusion upon your time.

EARL GRANVILLE: I only wish to say one word on my noble Friend's remarks. Her Majesty's Government did communicate the proposal both to the Russian and Austrian Ambassadors within an hour after it was made to France and Prussia.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND: I confess that when I heard of this Treaty I had a very great objection to it, for it seemed to me that the Treaty, though limited in duration, cast some slur upon the Treaty of 1839; but now, having heard the explanations of my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office, my objection is not so strong as it was at first. I thought, with others, it was desirable that the Government should make it known that it was their express determination to maintain the Treaty of 1839, which is still binding on this and other countries. But in my opinion it is desirable to have some instrument defining our obligations with more distinctness than the Treaty of 1839, as doubts have more than once been entertained as to the precise nature of those obligations, and we shall be thrown back upon that Treaty when the term of the present Treaty expires. Some doubt may in future arise as to the mode in which the Treaty is really operative, and I should have preferred some instrument of a permanent character, respecting which no doubts could arise—a Treaty entered into by the same great Powers, including the belligerents. I am, of course, not acquainted with the negotiations which have taken place. Austria has signified her intention to stand by her obligations; but I do not know what Russia will do. Perhaps she thinks the Treaty of 1839 sufficiently binding; and the other signatory Powers will probably entertain the same opinion. If any new instrument were necessary, it should have been merely a defining and declaratory one; and I agree with the noble Viscount that efforts should have been made to obtain the adhesion of other neutral Powers. I sincerely hope Her Majesty's Government have not tied their hands by entering into this fresh Treaty; for, if such is the case, their course of action will be limited, should any future necessity for action arise. It is difficult to define, in an engagement like the present, how far our obligations extend, and to what mode of action we were bound. It is not for us to incur any fresh obligations; while, at the same time, it is not for us to say that we have no interest in any part of the Continent, especially as regards the support of the smaller and neutral Powers. It is of great importance to us, politically as well as commercially, that Belgium and Holland should be maintained as independent Powers, and that two important Empires like France and Germany should not be entirely coterminous. I do not apprehend any danger on this head, especially now that the honour of two great countries is pledged. The Government have acted wisely in providing for the security of Belgium, though, as I have said, a different course might have offered a better permanent security, which in these times of change it would have been desirable to obtain. I wish to take this opportunity of expressing my satisfaction that the Government have not altered the existing law with regard to munitions of war. It would have been a very injudicious act, and one which would have created much rancour in France, to interfere with the export of coal, which though incipitibus usque, is an article of commerce between the two countries.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: Surely the Session ought not to close without an expression of thanks to Her Majesty's Government for the dignified and patriotic course they have pursued in this great and trying emergency. Perhaps I am not in a position to be the person to come forward to tender those thanks; but my feeling is so very strong that it overcomes my prudence. I cannot but come forward and say how deeply grateful I feel for the course they have taken in the face of such great dangers. I may add an expression of my hope and of my firm belief that the people of this country will sustain the Government in a course that is essential to the discharge of their duty to the interests and to the safety of the British Empire.

LORD REDESDALE thought that England should not have entered into any separate engagement, but should have adhered to the Treaty of 1839, unless assured that the former would be accepted by all the parties to the latter. In case of a violation of the neutrality of Belgium he did not see how they were to act, for they had no force there, and were debarred from exercising any force elsewhere.

EARL GRANVILLE: We are not debarred.

LORD REDESDALE understood they were bound to act within the territory of Belgium.

EARL GRANVILLE: No.

LORD REDESDALE urged that it would be extremely awkward if they had to take action without the full co-operation of Russia, as he feared would be the case.

LORD DENMAN hoped the Government, instead of arranging for a triangular duel, would do their utmost to restore peace. There was no passage in history which he more admired than the great scheme of Henry the Great, by which a police of all nations might have been established to prevent war. He hoped that directly the least appearance of equality appeared, that an armistice might be established; and there had never been a juncture at which agreement could more easily be obtained with justice to all parties, so far as the true object of an Ecumenical Council was attainable.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.
HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

The LORD CHANCELLOR then acquainted the House that Her Majesty had been pleased to grant two several Commissions:—And The LORDS COMMISSIONERS—namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR; The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Viscount Halifax); The EARL OF KIMBERLEY (Secretary of State for the Colonies); The MARQUESS OF NORMANBY; and The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sydney)—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form between the Throne and the Woolsack; and the COMMONS being come, with their Speaker, and the Commission to that purpose being read, the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills.

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"THE state of public business enables me to release you from your attendance in Parliament.

"I continue to receive from all Foreign Powers assurances of goodwill and friendship; but I have witnessed with grief and pain, on domestic as well as public grounds, the recent outbreak of war between two powerful nations, both of them allied with this country.

"My best exertions had been used to avert this great calamity.

"I shall now direct a constant and anxious attention to the strict observance of the duties and the maintenance of the rights of neutrality.

"I have cheerfully assented to the measure, matured by your wisdom, to enlarge the power of the Executive, not only for the discharge of international duties, but for the prevention of acts which, in times of war, might be injurious to the interests of the country.

"I shall make every fitting endeavour to check the operation of causes which might lead towards enlarging the area of the present conflict, and to contribute, if opportunity shall be afforded me, to the restoration of an early and honourable peace.

"I have tendered to the two Belligerent Powers Treaties identical in form to give additional security to Belgium against the hazards of a war waged upon her frontiers. This Treaty has been signed by Count Bernstorff on the part of the North German Confederation, and the French Ambassador has signified that he has authority to sign the corresponding instrument as soon as his full powers arrive. Other Powers, which were parties to the Treaty of 1839, have been invited to accede, if they should think fit, to this engagement.

"The shocking murders recently perpetrated in Greece produced a painful impression throughout Europe, and have drawn attention to serious evils existing in that country. My unremitting efforts will be directed to securing the complete and searching character of the inquiry which has been instituted.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the liberal provision which was made by you for the ordinary service of the year, and for the additional supplies of men and money which you have voted in view of the altered state of things on the Continent of Europe.

"The condition of the Revenue gives ground for the hope that it may be able to meet the new charge which has been created, without reversing the proper balance of income and expenditure.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"In regard to domestic legislation, I may fitly congratulate you on the close of a Session, marked by an assiduous devotion to labours of the utmost national importance.

"The temporary Act for the Repression of Agrarian Crime, and the maintenance of Order in Ireland, has, up to the present time, answered the purposes for which it was passed.

"From the Act for regulating the occupation and ownership of land, I anticipate the gradual establishment both of harmonious relations between owners and occupiers of land, and of general confidence in the provisions and administration of the law, and in the just and benevolent intentions of the Legislature.

"In consequence of the efforts which have been made in matters of capital moment, to remove from the Statute Book whatever might seem inequitable to Ireland, I trust that the discharge of the first duty of Government in providing for the security of life and property will become more easy; and I shall rely with confidence upon the loyalty and affection of my Irish subjects.

"It has given me pleasure to concur with you in the passage of the important law providing for National Education in England. I perceive in it a new guarantee for the moral and social well-being of the Nation, and for its prosperity and power.

"The Naturalization Act, and the Act for the Extradition of Criminals, will tend to confirm our friendly relations with Foreign Powers.

"The Act which regulates enlistment for a shortened term of service in the ranks of the Army will, I trust, tend to increase the efficiency of the force, to promote the welfare of the soldier, and to provide for the Nation a reserve of men well trained to arms, and ready in any case of emergency to return to the standards.

"I bid you farewell for the recess, with the earnest prayer that when you are again summoned to your duties I may be enabled to rejoice with you in the re-establishment of Peace on the Continent of Europe."

Then a Commission for proroguing Parliament was read.

After which,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Thursday the 27th day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday the 27th day of October next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 10th August, 1870.

MINUTES.]—NEW WAIR ISSUED.—For Dublin City, v. Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, void Election.

The House met at half after Twelve of the clock.

ARMY—FORTIFICATION OF FALMOUTH.
QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War,

Whether he has any objections to state the reasons why a plan for fortifying Falmouth, which has been for some years deposited in the War Office, has not been carried out.

MR. CARDWELL: I am informed, Sir, by the Inspector General of Fortifications that the last time the defences of Falmouth were reported upon was by a joint Naval and Military Committee in 1858. They proposed no addition to the then existing works and armaments, which they considered sufficient for its defence as a commercial port. They made some observations to the effect that, if it were considered necessary to protect Falmouth from being seized by an enemy with a view to military operations in that locality, additional defences would be necessary. They made, however, no specific proposal. Immediately afterwards the great fortifications at Plymouth were determined upon, and their execution commenced.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

MR. CANDLISH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When a Return, ordered by the House last Session, showing the increase in the Civil Service Estimates and Civil Service Expenditure since 1853, and the causes of such increase, will be ready and in the hands of Members?

MR. STANSFELD said, the Return to which his hon. Friend referred had been prepared with great care and labour, and he had no doubt would prove most interesting and useful to the Members of that House. It was now in the hands of the printer, and would shortly be distributed. He might generally indicate the nature of that Return. The excess on the Civil Service Estimates since 1853 had yesterday been stated at £5,019,540. Now, it was very desirable that hon. Members should know what was the meaning of that statement. He was not speaking without book when he said that a very large portion of that increase would be found capable of complete and satisfactory explanation; and the House ought to be grateful to those members of the Civil Service who had bestowed great labour on what he believed would prove a very correct and exhaustive account. The Civil Service Estimates had increased during the period referred to from a variety of causes. In the first instance, the transfers from the Consolidated Fund had, since that date, been to the amount of nearly £1,000,000. The House was also aware that a new and more distinctive form of Estimate had been obtained of late years. If his hon. Friend would compare the Estimates for the year 1854 with those of 1869-70, the net results would rather surprise him. In 1869-70 the net increase in the expenditure, as compared with 1853-4, was not £5,019,000 but £3,467,000. In Class 2 there had been an increase of £262,000, of which £150,000 had been for stationery and printing—a portion of that £150,000 being in relief of some other classes, the expenditure having formerly been paid from various Votes. In Class 3—Law and Justice—there had been a very large increase of expenditure, an increase of no less than £1,241,000. In Class 4—Education—there had been a net increase, which he expected would be still further augmented, of £758,000. In Class 5, for Diplomatic and Consular Services, there had been an increase of £114,000. Superannuations had also increased by £138,000. Turning to the Revenue Department, there had been a decrease of £200,000 in the Customs and Inland Revenue, and an increase of £1,100,000 upon the Post Office Administration, making a net increase of expenditure in the Revenue Department of £954,000. These various sums made up the actual excess of £3,467,000.

ZANZIBAR—LIBERATED SLAVES.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, On what grounds the Committee on the East African Slave Trade have recommended Zanzibar as a suitable place for locating liberated slaves to be employed as free labourers, and whose authority weighed with them in making such a recommendation; and when the Report of the joint Committee would be presented to Parliament?

MR. OTWAY said, in reply, that the Committee had recommended Zanzibar as a suitable place for locating liberated slaves—first, on account of the central position which it occupied, and secondly, because of the great and increasing demand for labour there, freedmen being able to earn very good wages. The recommendation was made principally upon the advice of Mr. Churchill, Her Majesty's political agent at Zanzibar. The Report of the joint Committee would be laid upon the Table; but hon. Members would see that for obvious reasons it would be very difficult to circulate copies for some time to come.

NAVY—DEPTFORD DOCKYARD.

QUESTION.

MR. EYKYN said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty Questions of which he had given him private Notice, concerning two points as to which he feared that considerable misapprehension still existed in the public mind. He wished to know, Whether there is any truth in a report, which has obtained very general circulation, that the Government, since the sale of Deptford Dockyard, have entertained the idea of repurchasing the whole, or some portion of it; also, whether the First Lord of the Admiralty will make such a statement as will relieve the Solicitor of the Admiralty from imputations attempted to be cast upon him with reference to negotiations for the sale of that Dockyard?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in replying to the two Questions of which my hon. Friend has been good enough to give me private Notice, I beg to say that there is no foundation whatever for the report to which he alludes, that the Government since the sale of Deptford Dockyard ever entertained the idea of repurchasing any portion of it. The sale was practically completed some time ago; the actual completion has merely been deferred, in consequence of a question as to title having arisen between the Admiralty Department and the Department of Woods and Works; but we have never dreamt of cancelling the sale, or buying back any part of the land. The second Question of my hon. Friend is whether I will make such a statement as will relieve the Solicitor to the Admiralty from imputations attempted to be cast upon him with reference to the negotiations for the sale of the dockyard. My hon. Friend and Colleague the Secretary to the Admiralty some time ago went very minutely into the matter, stated how the sale was conducted, and showed conclusively to the House that the Solicitor to the Admiralty had nothing to do with it. Unfortunately, the other day—I hope in the heat of the moment, and without previous intention—my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), without any Notice, charged the Solicitor to the Admiralty with being the brother-in-law of the purchaser, and with having connived at or with having had some share in the purchase. I said at the time, and I repeat now, that there is not the smallest foundation for that allegation. The purchaser of Deptford Dockyard is no relative whatever of the Solicitor to the Admiralty; the operations connected with the sale of the dockyard were conducted without the privity of the Solicitor to the Admiralty. The actual negotiations for the sale were conducted by an auctioneer in the City acting as agent for the Admiralty, and the Solicitor to the Admiralty neither directly nor indirectly had anything to do with it. I may add, that until some time ago, when the purchaser of the dockyard, in connection with another transaction, came to the Solicitor's office to sign a deed of guarantee, the Solicitor to the Admiralty and the purchaser did not even know each other.

IRELAND—DUBLIN CITY WRIT.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

Moved, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland to make out a New Writ for the electing of a Citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Dublin, in the room of Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, whose Election has been determined to be void.—(Mr. Noel.)

MR. VANCE said, he was glad the House was about to do a tardy act of justice in granting the second Member—so long and so unjustly withheld—to the City of Dublin, a constituency which he himself had represented for many years. The circumstances connected with the present Motion showed that the House ought to receive with great caution the Reports both of Judges and Commissioners with regard to contested elections; for, although both Judge and Commissioners reported, with regard to this constituency, that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed among the freemen electors, the House, after long and careful consideration of the circumstances, in its wisdom determined that the constituency ought not to be disfranchised. He once more congratulated the House upon the issue, even thus tardily, of the Writ for the City of Dublin.

Motion agreed to.

THE WELLINGTON MONUMENT.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. NEWDEGATE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Correspondence relating to the Wellington Monument in St. Paul's Cathedral, and to move a Resolution on the subject, said, the circumstances of the present time naturally directed the attention of the country to anything connected with the memory of the late Duke of Wellington, who, after having proved himself the foremost general of his age, afterwards, during the remainder of his life for 35 years and more, was the great conservator of peace. It was not until the Duke of Wellington was laid in his grave that the Crimean War broke out. The monument which that House had voted to the Duke did not stand in its due position in St. Paul's Cathedral, and it was natural that there should be impatience in the public mind at a circumstance so strange. The Papers relating to the monument, although ordered to be printed on the 22nd of July, were not accessible to Members of the House even yesterday. He did not wish to throw blame on any particular Department, or any particular individual, for the delay that had taken place in the erection of the monument; but if he moved a Resolution, it would be to the effect that the correspondence laid on the Table of the House did not furnish sufficient data to warrant the House in expressing any opinion whatever upon the circumstances of the case. It was within his knowledge that on the 6th of August a memorial was presented to the Prime Minister by the sculptor employed, Mr. Stevens, stating his side of the case, which did not appear fairly in the documents submitted to the House; and, as the First Commissioner of Works had informed the House that legal proceedings were about to be instituted against that gentleman and against Mr. Penrose, the surveyor of St. Paul's, he (Mr. Newdegate), in the cause of justice and according to the practice of the House, when judicial proceedings were pending, trusted that the House would decline to express any opinion, in order that the case might not be prejudiced in the public mind, or before the Courts of Law. He had taken up this matter simply in the cause of justice. This much was now known. Mr. Stevens was desired to supply plans for a monument which should cost £20,000; but he was afterwards induced by the then head of the Board of Works to attempt to erect that monument for £14,000. Nor was that all, for the Board of Works required him to erect a full-sized model of the monument at an additional cost of £4,000, a great part of which came out of his pocket. Mr. Stevens, however, actuated by a feeling of honour toward his brother artists, whom he had surpassed in the competition for a plan of a monument specified to cost £20,000, and, perhaps, by other feelings, rather than mar the effect of the monument, resolved to carry out the work even to some extent at his own cost. He (Mr. Newdegate) was credibly informed that Mr. Stevens had already spent £2,000 of his own money on the monument; and, to obtain this money, had been obliged to take other orders, which accounted, in a great degree, for the delay; but it was clear, from the Papers before the House, that the Board of Works had lost six years before they finally directed Mr. Stevens to commence the work. He begged to move for the Correspondence.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Correspondence with respect to the Wellington Monument, as laid upon the Table of this House, does not furnish sufficient data whereby this House can form an opinion upon the circumstances of the case."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

Mr. AYRTON said, the hon. Member would probably have done more wisely if he had adhered to the rule he had prescribed when he commenced his remarks—namely, that nothing should be said to prejudice the case of Mr. Stevens; but, instead of saying nothing on the subject-matter in dispute, the hon. Member had invited him to state the case of the Government against Mr. Stevens in answer to his remarks. He would be more generous to Mr. Stevens than the hon. Member, and, instead of following the hon. Gentleman's remarks, would content himself with referring to the Papers on the Table. From these

it would be seen that the hon. Member was in error in almost every observation that he had made. Any hon. Member who chose to read the letters printed in pages 1 and 3 would see how entirely the hon. Gentleman had been misled. He was afraid the hon. Member could not have read the Papers to which he referred, or he would not have made the remarks he had done. The hon. Member thought that this correspondence did not furnish all the information necessary to enable the House to understand the responsibilities of Mr. Stevens to the Crown. The Papers, as far as they went, contained the most accurate information on the subject. The hon. Member had not hinted that any Paper had been kept back, but had informed the House that the Papers laid on the Table came down only to the 23rd of July, whereas Mr. Stevens had drawn up a memorial in the beginning of August which he desired to have added. There would not be the slightest objection to lay that Paper on the Table, and also the letters of Mr. Penrose, which would give all the information up to the present hour. But that would not, in the slightest degree, support the Resolution which the hon. Member had moved, suggesting that the correspondence was imperfect, because the circumstances to which he alluded had all occurred since these Papers had been laid on the Table. If the hon. Member, therefore, would withdraw his Resolution, and move that the further letters of Mr. Penrose and Mr. Stevens be laid on the Table, he had not the slightest objection to offer. But that, of course, would not interfere with the proceedings which were necessary to establish the rights of the Crown.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would be satisfied with that course if all the documents connected with the subject would be submitted to the House.

MR. AYRTON said, if the hon. Member wished for the anterior documents which had passed between the First Commissioner and Mr. Penrose and Mr. Stevens he was quite at liberty to move for their production also.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Copy ordered, "of all further Correspondence relative to the Wellington Monument between Mr. Penrose or Mr. Stevens with any Department of Her Majesty's Government up to the present time."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

Mr. Ayrton

NEUTRALITY OF BELGIUM.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: As I understand, Sir, that during my absence in the discharge of other duties yesterday a desire was expressed by some hon. Gentlemen to make observations upon the recent proceedings of Her Majesty's Government with respect to affairs abroad, I think it is desirable that the House should be in possession of the facts up to the present time—that is to say, precisely as they will presently receive them in the Speech from the Throne. I therefore wish to mention that the Treaty proposed by Her Majesty's Government to the belligerent Powers has been actually signed by Count Bernstorff on the part of the North German Confederation, as well as by Earl Granville on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and also that M. de Lavalette, the Ambassador of the Emperor of the French at this Court, has, in a letter dated yesterday, stated that he is now in a position to announce to Earl Granville that he is authorized by the Government of the Emperor to adhere to the Treaty proposed by the British Government, for the more effective guarantee of the neutrality of Belgium. He adds, I shall sign the Treaty as soon as I shall receive the full powers which I expect for that purpose. With regard to the instrument itself, perhaps it would be convenient for the better understanding of what has been done that I should simply read the principal articles, omitting, for the sake of clearness, the ordinary preamble. The first Article is this—

"His Majesty the Emperor of the French having declared that, notwithstanding the hostilities in which France is now engaged with the North German Confederation, it is his fixed determination to respect the neutrality of Belgium so long as the same shall be respected by the North German Confederation; Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, on her part, declares that if during the said hostilities the armies of the North German Confederation should violate that neutrality, she will be prepared to co-operate with His Imperial Majesty for the defence of the same in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon, employing for that purpose her naval and military forces to insure its observance; and to maintain, in conjunction with His Imperial Majesty, then and thereafter, the independence and neutrality of Belgium. It is clearly understood that Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland does not engage herself by this Treaty to take part in any of the general operations of the war now carried on between France and the North German Confederation beyond the limits of Belgium, as defined in the Treaty between Belgium and the Netherlands of April 19, 1839."

The second Article is this—

"His Majesty the Emperor of the French agrees, on his part, in the event provided for in the foregoing Article, to co-operate with Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, employing his naval and military forces for the purpose aforesaid, and, the case arising, to concert with Her Majesty the measures which shall be taken separately or in common to secure the neutrality and independence of Belgium."

The third Article is this—

"This Treaty shall be binding on the High Contracting Parties during the continuance of the present war between France and the North German Confederation, and for twelve months after the ratification of any Treaty of Peace concluded between those parties; and, on the expiration of that time, the independence and neutrality of Belgium will, so far as the high contracting parties respectively are concerned, continue to rest as heretofore on the first Article of the Quintuple Treaty of the 19th of April, 1839."

Sir, such is the Treaty which we have proposed to the belligerent Powers, mutatis mutandis. There is some correspondence on the subject; but I think the reading of the principal Articles will give the House all the information that is necessary.

MR. OSBORNE: I do not know whether it is competent to any Member to make remarks on this extraordinary document. I will only say that there never has been a more extraordinary document, or a more extraordinary manner of producing such a document on a great crisis like this in the history of the British House of Commons. Now, we have had recently so many strange revelations of diplomatic proceedings that I have myself lost all faith in diplomacy. Indeed, Sir, I am very much inclined to think that if our other weapons are not in better order we are very badly off, as the weapons of our diplomatists are not remarkable as arms of precision. For what a Treaty is this! For my own part I would sooner have no Treaty at all, because I think this Treaty involves hidden dangers which nobody can foresee. In the first place, this Treaty is entirely superfluous if the Treaty of 1839 is worth anything at all. In the eyes of Austria and Russia that Treaty of 1839 is entirely superseded by this. You have struck a blow at that Treaty, which you can never put in the same position again. Where is the article? Now, do look as men of common sense, and not as versed in diplomacy—

MR. GLADSTONE: The observation of the hon. Member causes me to think that I must have given the third Article somewhat imperfectly. The third Article contains these words—

"This Treaty shall be binding on the high contracting parties during the continuance of the present war between France and the North German Confederation, and for twelve months after the ratification of any Treaty of Peace concluded between those parties; and, on the expiration of that time, the independence and neutrality of Belgium will, so far as the high contracting parties respectively are concerned, continue to rest as heretofore on the first Article of the Quintuple Treaty of the 19th of April, 1839."

MR. OSBORNE: Well, if either belligerent violates the neutrality of Belgium, England binds herself to co-operate with the other to repel the invader, but not to take part in the general operations of the war. Was there ever such a stipulation as that? Her Majesty's Government appear to think that you can conduct the operations of war, if Belgium is attacked, on the homœopathic principle. Do you think that if any power should violate the neutrality of Belgium they will not strike at the most vulnerable point; and do you propose to tie up your hands by saying that you will not strike at the most vital part of the enemy? This does appear to me the most extraordinary instrument in the whole history of diplomacy. If I were a member of the numerous party which consists of the seven wise men we saw the other night, I should resist this Treaty on those grounds. I think it increases the present dangers; and now Parliament is about to separate, here is an instance of what we call secret diplomacy! Would it not be much better and safer for this country if we had known before what the Articles of this Treaty were—if, in fact, they had been laid upon the Table of this House? I am sure if it had been brought before the House as a substantive Motion, the House would not have assented to such a Treaty being signed. I will not go into the reasons for preserving the neutrality of Belgium. Like my hon. Friend below me (Mr. Taylor), I am as much against war as any man; but circumstances may occur in which it may be necessary for this country to undertake war, in order to maintain not only our honour, but our liberties. How will this Treaty do that? If, as may happen, this conjecture should arise; if both of the contending parties should enter Belgium, what, then, becomes of your Treaty? It may be a necessity of their position; and your Treaty would be useless, although, no doubt, these two Powers, being now engaged in a life and death struggle, may be ready enough to sign anything to keep you quiet. I wish to say a words about this Belgian question, as I do not wish to be misunderstood. There appears to be a party in this country who, overlooking the situation of Belgium and Antwerp and the long seaboard of that country, think it is a matter of indifference to us to whom Belgium belongs, and that we should take no step to maintain its neutrality and independence. Have these people ever pictured to themselves that if Belgium were in the hands of a hostile Power, the liberties and the position of this country would not be worth 24 hours' purchase? And is it not better to regard Belgium as an outwork of our own liberties and independence than to take a narrow view and say we will not go to war for any purpose whatever? It is because I hold that not only our honour, but our interests are concerned, that I would support the Government in maintaining the Treaty of 1839. But by the course they have pursued in laying this childish perpetration of diplomatic folly before us, I think they are absolutely imperilling the independence of Belgium and placing England in a very inferior position.

Mr. WHITE: I move that the House be now prorogued.

Mr. BUXTON: I think, Sir, that the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Osborne) does not at all express the feelings of the people of this country. I believe their universal feeling will be one of gratitude to the Government for taking a course which, above all others, is calculated to preserve peace.

SIR HENRY LYTTON BULWER: I am glad, Sir, to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) in his place, for I think that opposition is the salt of politics, and that any speech of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government has always more flavour when seasoned by a speech from my right

hon. Friend opposite. However, if the salt has not yet come from the quarter opposite, it has come from that behind me. Sir, I agree with some of the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne); but I agree also with some that fell from the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Buxton). The object of this country and every country should be peace; but when war is necessary, I am not, as my hon. Friend said, for a war on homœopathic principles. Neither is war a thing that can be limited or restrained. "It slips"—to use a phrase now historical—"through one's fingers;" and if our soldiers were being shot down by Chassepôts on shore, I doubt whether our sailors would preserve strict neutrality on the ocean. But let me point out that which I did not myself know until the new Treaty was just read to us. It merely engages us to defend the soil of Belgium—this is true—but it does not engage us not to do anything more. In all other respects we are as free as if it had never been signed, and this refutes many of the arguments which ought otherwise to have been urged against it. I will not deny that it is still open to objections. But, in great affairs we must look at great effects and overlook minor questions of doubt and controversy. The main effect to produce at the moment when this Treaty was entered into was to convince Europe and the world that we were keenly alive to our honour and were determined to stand by our engagements. That effect this Treaty did produce, and therefore, without being critical as to its provisions, I think it entitles Her Majesty's Government to the thanks of its friends and the confidence of the country. But events pass so rapidly in these telegraphic times that our care at this moment need not be so much to preserve Belgium from France, as to preserve France from the consequences of the rash enterprize into which it so heedlessly and so needlessly entered. And this, Sir, seems to me the moment when I may say that we are not wholly to forget that the Ruler of that country—whatever his faults, wrong, I grant you, in provoking this disastrous conflict—has been, nevertheless, for many years our firm and friendly ally, that he has stood by our side on the field of battle, that he has sat by our side in the great Councils of Europe, and that during his reign France and England have lived in closer terms of amity and intimacy than at any former period. I say this, because, as I never worshipped him in his prosperity, I can respect him in his adversity. But, apart from all questions of persons—whoever may rule over a neighbouring people—let us not forget that the land which is now, not unjustly, menaced by the sword of an invader, is the land to whose graceful civilization Europe is so much indebted. Thus, Sir, whilst it is far from my wish or advice that we should intermeddle inopportunely in this quarrel, I cannot help saying that if an occasion should arrive, at which, with the consent of both parties, my right hon. Friend at the head of Her Majesty's Government should be able, by a friendly mediation, to arrest the horrors of war in a country so eminent in the arts of peace, and save from the still greater horrors of tumult and revolution a capital that is the pride and ornament of the whole world, he will achieve a task as glorious as any that ever illustrated a Minister of England.

MR. WHITE: It is not often that I venture to say anything in praise of the Government, because they ordinarily receive plenty of praise from hon. Members sitting behind them; but as an independent Member, sitting below the Gangway, I must say I think this is a proposition in respect to which, as an economist, I ought to express my heartfelt gratitude for the course which the Government have taken. Even if there had been no Treaty of 1831 or of 1839, I hold that it would have been the duty of England to sustain the neutrality and independence of Belgium. Anyone with even a superficial knowledge of political events could not but feel sure the absorption by France of that model and, I must say, beloved kingdom—because, from the admirable manner in which it is governed, it appeals to our best and warmest feelings—must cause an annual addition of £10,000,000 to our War Estimates; and even then we should be in perpetual apprehension as long as a neighbouring nation was living under the personal rule of any one man. I deeply regret that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer) who spoke last has made the remarks he did, with reference to our Government interfering with the object of bringing about peace between the combatants. I think that this is a very grave matter; and, although a friendly mediation may, sooner or later, be acceptable, I doubt whether it would be wise to proffer or tender it until it is asked for. The right hon. Gentleman has said that France has been our consistent and hearty ally for some years; and this provokes a remark which I should not otherwise have made. Now, it must be recollected that there is also something to be set down on the other side of the account. It was through France that we engaged in the Crimean War—["No, no!"]—it was for French interests that we embarked in the Russian War—it was, undoubtedly, for the sustentation of the Napoleonic dynasty that we were led into it. Again, who was it that instigated the British Government so insidiously and persistently to acknowledge the independence of the Southern States of America? Was it not the Monarch who was so much lauded by the right hon. Gentleman? May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that it was the same Monarch that projected the Mexican Expedition, in which we were at first allied; and it was only when we saw the personal ends which he had in view that we retired, and retired with honour, from that disastrous expedition. I only mention this because, while I feel that it is very desirable we should have amicable relations with foreign potentates, yet I think it is possible to be too intimate with them, and I do not wish that we should be so very intimate as to be thereby led into future entanglements. As to the course which the Government has adopted, I think it is wise, prudent, and circumspect to a degree for which it deserves the highest praise, expressly limiting, as it does, the operation of this Supplementary Treaty, as I may call it, to the attainment of the object this country has in view, and I firmly believe it will secure the independence and neutrality of Belgium. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) asks how it will be if it should happen that both of the belligerents should violate the neutrality of Belgium. Now, it is but justice to say that the Belgians have had no apprehension whatever from Prussia; in all the diplomatic correspondence which has passed there is no reference to Prussia as a Power from which Belgium has hitherto had any cause to fear. The Belgian lamb has only been—alas, too often—frightened by the French wolf. No instance whatever can you find in which any allusion is officially made to the aggrandizement of Prussia at the expense of Belgium. There were apprehensions in many quarters that the British Government would not rise to the height of the occasion. I rejoice it has risen to the full height of the present emergency, and I confidently rely that it will secure the object this country has at heart—namely, the neutrality and independence of Belgium. I do not belong to that party which thinks England has but one duty, and that is to take care only of herself. I deny that such an exclusive and selfish policy would even effect what is wished by those who advocate it. I hold, and I believe the Government rightly recognizes, with Edmund Burke, that to a people who have once been proud and great, and great because they were proud, the decay of national spirit would be the most terrible of all revolutions.

COLONEL BARTELOT: Sir, I must express my opinion that anyone speaking in the House of Commons now ought be careful of what he says; and I think it a very foolish thing to do what my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White) has just done—to go into matters which are much better left alone. I am perfectly satisfied that the English nation sympathizes with both belligerents. I am sure it is sorry they have gone to war, and that it hopes England may be kept out of hostilities. There was one subject on which this country did feel anxiety—I mean the subject of Belgium. The First Minister of the Crown, in his wisdom, did not think it right to give us such an explanation as would reassure the mind of the country; but since that time he has reconsidered the point—[Mr. GLADSTONE: “No.”]—and we now know that we are going to act on Treaties we entered into, and that we intend to maintain the neutrality of Belgium. I will not allude to the new Treaty now on the Table of the House, further than to say that I think it would have been better to adhere to the Treaty of 1839. I think if the Government had stated boldly that we adhered to the Treaty of 1839, and intended to maintain the neutrality of Belgium, that would have been sufficient. The country would have known what was meant by that, and would have been ready and willing to fulfil its obligations. All I hope now is, that we shall not be called on to go to war for Belgium. I trust the neutrality of that kingdom will be preserved, and that the war between France and Prussia will soon be at an end. If the First Minister of the Crown should have any hand in putting an end to it, we shall meet him here with great pleasure next Session.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT: I should like, Sir, to know whether Belgium herself approves this Treaty; and whether Austria and Russia have given their consent to this preliminary Treaty, and if not, in what position we shall find ourselves as regards the other neutral Powers joined in the guarantee of 1839? I feel myself unable to give an opinion on this Supplemental Treaty. It would require stronger arguments than we have heard to-day to prove that the Treaty of 1839 needed any substitute; and I think it would have been for the public interest if the Government had not prorogued Parliament till ample time had been given for the communication of this Treaty, and for the House and the country to consider it. A good deal has been said about the unadvisability of expressing any feeling of sympathy for one side or the other; but it was impossible to avoid it, because no one can shut his eyes to the fact that the object of the war on one side was the safety of a dynasty, and on the other the consolidation—the building up of Germany. In that latter object I take, and the people of England must take, a great interest; but we are very little interested in the safety of the Imperial dynasty. I hope the First Minister of the Crown will be able to answer these questions, with the view of clearing up points that seem to require explanation.

MR. GLADSTONE: As far as I understand, my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) has complained that we have destroyed the Treaty of 1839 by this instrument. As I pay so much attention to everything that falls from him, I thought that by some mistake I must have read the instrument inaccurately; but I have read it again, and I find that by one of the Articles contained in it the Treaty of 1839 is expressly recognized. But there is one omission I made in the matter which I will take the present opportunity to supply. The House, I think, have clearly understood that this instrument expresses an arrangement between this country and France; but an instrument has been signed between this country and the North German Confederation precisely the same in its terms, except that where the name of the Emperor of the French is read in one instrument, the name of the German Confederation is read in the other, and vice versa. I have listened with much interest to the conversation which has occurred, and I think we have no reason to be dissatisfied at the manner in which, speaking generally, this Treaty has been received. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White) speaking, as he says, from below the Gangway, is quite right in thinking that his approval of the course the Government have taken is gratifying to us, on account of the evidently independent course of action which he always pursues in this House. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Bartelot) has expressed a different opinion from ours on the great question of policy, and he asks whether we should not have done well to limit ourselves to the Treaty of 1839. We differ entirely on that subject from the hon. and gallant Gentleman; but we cannot complain of the manner in which he has expressed his opinion and recognized the intentions of the Government. From Gentlemen who sit behind me we have had more positive and unequivocal expressions of approval than fell from the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The only person who strongly objects to the course taken by the Government is my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Waterford; and I do not in the least object to his frank method of stating whatever he feels in opposition to our proceedings in a matter of so much consequence, though I do think it necessary to notice some of his objections. In the first place, he denounces this Treaty as an example of the mischiefs of secret diplomacy. He thinks that if the Treaty had been submitted to the House it would not have been agreed to. My hon. and gallant Friend is a man much enamoured of public diplomacy. He remembers, no doubt, that three weeks ago the Duc de Gramont went to the Legislative Body of France and made an announcement as to the policy which the French Government would pursue with respect to Prussia. The result of that example of public diplomacy no doubt greatly encouraged my hon. and gallant Friend. Then we have a specimen in the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend of the kind of public diplomacy which we should have in this case if his hopes and desires were realized. He says that if Belgium were in the hands of a hostile Power the liberties of this country would not be worth 24 hours' purchase. I protest against that statement. With all my heart and soul I protest against it. A statement more exaggerated, a statement more extravagant, I never heard fall from the lips of any Member in this House. [Mr. OSBORNE: Napoleon said it.] Whatever my hon. and gallant Friend's accurate acquaintance with the correspondence of Napoleon may induce him to say, I may be permitted to observe that I am not prepared to take my impression of the character, of the strength, of the dignity, of the duty, or of the danger of this country from that correspondence. I will avail myself of this opportunity of expressing my opinion, if I may presume to give it, that too much has been said by my hon. and gallant Friend and others of the specially distinct, separate, and exclusive interest which this country has in the maintenance of the neutrality of Belgium. What is our interest in maintaining the neutrality of Belgium? It is the same as that of every great Power in Europe. It is contrary to the interest of Europe that there should be unmeasured aggrandizement. Our interest is no more involved in the aggrandizement supposed in this particular case than is the interest of the other Powers. That it is a real interest, a substantial interest, I do not deny; but I protest against the attempt to attach to it the exclusive character which I never knew carried into the region of caricature to such a degree as it has been by my hon. and gallant Friend. What is the immediate moral effect of those exaggerated statements of the separate interest of England? The immediate moral effect of them is this—that every effort we make on behalf of Belgium on other grounds than those of interest—as well as on grounds of interest, goes forth to the world as a separate and selfish scheme of ours; and that which we believe to be entitled to the dignity and credit of an effort on behalf of the general peace, stability, and interest of Europe actually contracts a taint of selfishness in the eyes of other nations because of the manner in which the subject of Belgian neutrality is too frequently treated in this House. If I may be allowed to speak of the motives which have actuated Her Majesty's Government in the matter, I would say that while we have recognized the interest of England, we have never looked upon it as the sole motive, or even as the greatest of those considerations which have urged us forward. There is, I admit, the obligation of the Treaty. It is not necessary, nor would time permit me, to enter into the complicated question of the nature of the obligations of that Treaty; but I am not able to subscribe to the doctrine of those who have held in this House what plainly amounts to an assertion, that the simple fact of the existence of a guarantee is binding on every party to it irrespectively altogether of the particular position in which it may find itself at the time when the occasion for acting on the guarantee arises. The great authorities upon foreign policy to whom I have been accustomed to listen—such as Lord Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston—never, to my knowledge, took that rigid and, if I may venture to say so, that impracticable view of a guarantee. The circumstance that there is already an existing guarantee in force is of necessity an important fact, and a weighty element in the case, to which we are bound to give full and ample consideration. There is also this further consideration, the force of which we must all feel most deeply, and that is the common interest against the unmeasured aggrandizement of any Power whatever. But there is one other motive, which I shall place at the head of all, that attaches peculiarly to the preservation of the independence of Belgium. What is that country? It is a country containing 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of people, with much of an historic past, and imbued with a sentiment of nationality and a spirit of independence as warm and as genuine as that which beats in the hearts of the proudest and most powerful nations. By the regulation of its internal concerns, amid the shocks of revolution, Belgium, through all the crises of the age, has set to Europe an example of a good and stable government gracefully associated with the widest possible extension of the liberty of the people. Looking at a country such as that, is there any man who hears me who does not feel that if, in order to satisfy a greedy appetite for aggrandizement, coming whence it may, Belgium were absorbed, the day that witnessed that absorption would hear the knell of public right and public law in Europe? But we have an interest in the independence of Belgium which is wider than that—which is wider than that which we may have in the literal operation of the guarantee. It is found in the answer to the question whether, under the circumstances of the case, this country, endowed as it is with influence and power, would quietly stand by and witness the perpetration of the direst crime that ever stained the pages of history, and thus become participators in the sin? And now let me deal with the observations of the hon. Member for Waterford. The hon. Member asks—What if both these Powers with whom we are making this Treaty should combine against the independence of Belgium? Well, all I can say is that we rely on the faith of these parties. But if there be danger of their combining against that independence now, unquestionably there was much more danger in the position of affairs that was revealed to our astonished eyes a fortnight ago, and before these later engagements were contracted. I do not undertake to define the character of that position which, as I have said, was more dangerous a fortnight ago. I feel confident that it would be hasty to suppose that these great States would, under any circumstances, have become parties to the actual contemplation and execution of a proposal such as that which was made the subject of communication between persons of great importance on behalf of their respective States. That was the state of facts with which we had to deal. It was the combination, and not the opposition, of the two Powers which we had to fear, and I contend—and we shall be ready on every proper occasion to argue—that there is no measure so well adapted to meet the peculiar character of such an occasion as that which we have proposed. It is said that the Treaty of 1839 would have sufficed, and that we ought to have announced our determination to abide by it. But if we were disposed at once to act upon the guarantee contained in that Treaty, what state of circumstances does it contemplate? It contemplates the invasion of the frontiers of Belgium and the violation of the neutrality of that country by some other Power. That is the only case in which we could have been called upon to act under the Treaty of 1839, and that is the only case in which we can be called upon to act under the Treaty now before the House. But in what, then, lies the difference between the two Treaties? It is in this—that, in accordance with our obligations, we should have had to act under the Treaty of 1839 without any stipulated assurance of being supported from any quarter whatever against any combination, however formidable; whereas by the Treaty now formally before Parliament, under the conditions laid down in it, we secure powerful support in the event of our having to act—a support with respect to which we may well say that it brings the object in view within the sphere of the practicable and attainable, instead of leaving it within the sphere of what might have been desirable, but which might have been most difficult, under all the circumstances, to have realized. The hon. Member says that by entering into this engagement we have destroyed the Treaty of 1839. But if he will carefully consider the terms of this instrument he will see that there is nothing in them calculated to bear out that statement. It is perfectly true that this is a cumulative Treaty, added to the Treaty of 1839, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), with perfect precision, described it. Upon that ground I very much agree with the general opinion he expressed; but, at the same time, peculiar circumstances call for a departure from general rules, and the circumstances are most peculiar under which we have thought it right to adopt the method of proceeding which we have actually done. The Treaty of 1839 loses nothing of its force even during the existence of this present Treaty. There is no derogation from it whatever. The Treaty of 1839 includes terms which are expressly included in the present instrument, lest by any chance it should be said that, in consequence of the existence of this instrument, the Treaty of 1839 had been injured or impaired. That would have been a mere opinion; but it is an opinion which we thought fit to provide against. The hon. Member has said that this is a most peculiar method of bringing a Treaty before the House. I admit it. There is no doubt at all that it is so. But it is not easy to say what circumstances there are that will justify the breaking up of general rules in a matter so delicate and important as the making of communications to Parliament upon political negotiations of great interest. The rule which has been uniformly followed in this country is this—that no Treaty is communicated to Parliament unless it becomes binding; and it does not become absolutely binding upon the signatories until it has been ratified; and, by the law and usage of all civilized countries, ratification requires certain forms to be gone through which cannot be concluded in a moment. Under these circumstances, we had only this choice—whether we should be contented to present a Treaty to Parliament without the usual forms having been gone through, or whether we should break down the rule which we think it is, on the whole, most desirable to observe, and we thought it best to adopt the course we have followed in the matter. The hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Somerset Beaumont) has asked whether this Treaty has been concluded with the sanction of Belgium. My answer is that I do not doubt the relevancy of that inquiry, but that the Treaty has not been concluded with the sanction of Belgium, for we have advisedly refrained from any attempt to make Belgium a party to the engagement. In the first place, Belgium was not a party to the Treaty of 1839. But that is a matter of secondary importance. What we had to consider was, what was the most prudent, the best, and the safest course for us to pursue in the interest of Belgium. Independently of Belgium, we had no right to assume that either of the parties would agree to it, and we had also to contemplate the case in which one party might agree to it and the other might not. If we had attempted to make Belgium a party we should have run the risk of putting her in a very false position in the event of one of the parties not agreeing to the proposal. It was, therefore, from no want of respect or friendly feeling towards Belgium, but simply from prudential considerations, that we abstained from bringing that country within the circle of these negotiations. The hon. Member has also asked whether Austria and Russia have been consulted upon the subject of the Treaty, but upon that point I have nothing to add to what I communicated to the House the other day. Both those parties have been invited—as Her Majesty has been advised to announce from the Throne—to accede to the Treaty, and I said on Monday that the reception of the Treaty as far as those Powers were concerned had been generally favourable. I have no reason to alter that statement; but, on the part of Russia, a question has arisen with regard to which I cannot quite say how it may eventually close, especially from the circumstance that the Emperor and his chief advisers upon foreign affairs do not happen to be in the same place. That question, so raised, is whether it might be wise to give a wider scope to any engagements of this kind; but if there is any hesitation on this point, it is not of a kind which indicates an objection of principle, but, on the contrary, one which shows a disposition to make every possible effort in favour of the Treaty. We are in full communication with friendly and neutral Powers on the subject of maintaining neutrality, and upon every side the very best dispositions prevail. There is the greatest inclination to abstain from all officious intermeddling between two Powers who, from their vast means and resources, are perfectly competent for the conduct of their own affairs; and there is not a less strong and decided desire on the part of every Power to take every step at the present moment that can contribute to restrict and circumscribe the area of the war, and to be ready, without having lost or forfeited the confidence of either belligerent, to avail itself of the first opportunity that may present itself to contribute towards establishing a peace which shall be honourable, and which shall present the promise of being permanent. That is the general state of the case, with regard to which I do not, in the least degree, question the right of any hon. Member behind me to form his own judgment. I cannot help expressing the opinion that, allowing for all the difficulties of the case, and the rapidity with which it was necessary to conduct these operations, we have done all that appeared to be essential in the matter; and the country may feel assured that the conduct which we have pursued in relation to this matter has not been unworthy of the high responsibility with which we are intrusted.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Message to attend The LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

The House went;—and the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills.

And afterwards Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech was delivered to both Houses of Parliament by The LORD CHANCELLOR, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Commands.

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Thursday the 27th day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday the 27th day of October next.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL.

THIRD READING.

DISSENTIENT :

"1. Because in Clause 2, the division of the so-called High Court of Justice for the convenient despatch of business into five divisional courts, to be styled respectively the Court of Chancery, the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, the Court of Exchequer, and the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Court (excluding the name of the Rolls Court), and the uncertainty caused by the words in the third line of the second page, "or to be otherwise styled in such manner as Her Majesty may, by Order in Council, from time to time determine," and "each of the said courts shall be presided over by a Lord President," is no improvement on the well known division of business now relied upon by suitors; whilst the grouping together of judges, several of whom at present sit alone, is a waste of power which is unnecessary, and because the names of the heads of each court are now well known, and their duties defined, the transfer of equity jurisdiction to them may induce the framers of rules to introduce the system of Bill and Answer into courts in which the pleadings have become every year less complicated, and in such case the alteration of the system of our ancient courts will cause great delay and uncertainty.

VOL. CCIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

"2. Because some such improvement as the procedure in petitions of right (simplified by Lord Westbury) is needful to be known by the public before a sweeping change in Common Law Procedure is hastily projected.

"3. Because if only one judge sit at all times to try civil causes, and only one judge for criminal causes at all times of the year, with the exception of legal vacations, there will be danger of having a divided bar, unless great care be taken to prevent the clashing with circuits.

"4. Because the Report of the Commission upon which this Bill was founded was considered by the Law Amendment Society as the production more of a small cabinet of lawyers than of representatives of the general feelings of the Bench, the Bar, and the Legal Profession.

"5. Because the Incorporated Law Society, in their last petition, attach great importance to the formation of a code which should inform the profession what course should be adopted in procedure, and do not desire indefinite improvement.

"6. Because also the Incorporated Law Society have just fears of the provision for compulsory arbitration, especially by men unacquainted with the law, whose awards may not be made in a binding form; and the temptation to refer causes being very great, some check should be imposed, if not equal to the present right by either side to refuse his consent to a reference, yet sufficient to prevent the plaintiff from wishing in vain to withdraw his record, and the defendant from submitting to injustice rather than incur the expense and delay of arbitration.

IRISH LAND BILL.

SECOND READING.

DISSENTIENT :

"Because some of the provisions of this Bill are opposed to the just rights of property, and are admitted by its advocates to be unfit to be made the law in England and Scotland, and to be only justified in Ireland on account of the existing relations between landlord and tenant in some parts of that country, which they consider exceptional, and hope may be removed under the operation of this measure.

"Because it is proposed that these provisions, instead of being imposed for a limited period to meet an exceptional state of things, are to be enacted permanently, and thereby appear to be established as principles which ought to exist by law at all times between landlord and tenant, and any attempt to repeal them, although the exceptional reason for their introduction may have passed away, will be attended with serious opposition and discontent.

"Because this enactment of them as principles is likely to lead to agitation for the extension of similar provisions to England and Scotland, in order that one system of permanent law on the subject may be established throughout the United Kingdom.

IRISH LAND BILL.—REPORT.

DISSENTIENT :

"1. Because the provisions of this Bill involve an interference with the acknowledged rights of property, to an extent without precedent in the legislation of any civilized country.

"2. Because this Bill has been founded on an alleged exceptional state of affairs as to the relations between landlord and tenant, which allegations are not founded on facts, it having been satisfactorily shown that the land in Ireland is rented at a lower rate than that in any part of Central Europe, and that evictions, other than those for non-payment of rent, have been inconsiderable.

"3. Because exceptional legislation is calculated to create an exceptional state of circumstances, and to interpose a barrier to the future improvement of the country.

"4. Because the liberty of contract upon which all transactions between man and man ought to be based, is improperly interfered with, restricted, and violated, to the disadvantage of the Commonwealth, and destructive to personal responsibility.

"5. Because the effect of this Bill will be to promote litigation between the owners and occupiers of the soil, and to interfere with those reciprocal feelings of cordiality and good will on which the welfare of an agricultural community so much depends.

"6. Because the imposition of a tax in Ireland which is not imposed on a like article in England, as is done by this Bill, is a direct violation of the Treaty of Union between Great Britain and Ireland.

"7. Because, while professing to give security of tenure to the small farmers, the obvious consequence of this Bill will be to promote the consolidation of farms, and the removal of the Irish peasantry from their small holdings.

IRISH LAND BILL.—THIRD READING:

DISSENTIENT.

"1. Because property has its rights as well as its duties, and the present Bill is the greatest violation of them in modern times.

"2. Because the interests of landlord and tenant are identical, and whatever injures the one cannot fail to injure the other.

"3. Because this Bill is contrary to all the received principles of political economy.

"4. Because this Bill will be more severe against the improving and indulgent landlord than the harsh and inconsiderate one.

"5. Because it will produce a great amount of litigation, and necessarily produce collisions between parties who have hitherto been on the most friendly terms.

"6. Because it will paralyze the attempts of landlords to improve the condition of their tenantry and to introduce a good system of husbandry.

"7. Because no legislation will settle the land question as long as successive Governments, under the influence of party exigencies, encourage professional agitators to disturb the minds of the people.

Capture and Murder of British Subjects, Correspondence (Parts I. and II., 1870) presented (The Earl of Clarendon); short debate thereon April 28, [200] 1960; Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply,
 The Earl of Clarendon; short debate thereon
 May 23, [201] 1162

Moved, "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty to assure Her Majesty that the House continues to regard with the deepest grief and horror the late atrocious murders perpetrated near Athens by a band of organized brigands on the persons of several of Her Majesty's subjects, including the Secretary of Her Majesty's Legation; to thank Her Majesty for the ample and early accounts thereof which it has pleased Her Majesty to communicate to the House; to submit whether there be not grounds for apprehending that the lives of the lamented victims were mainly sacrificed to parties acting more or less in secret understanding with the brigands; and to express an earnest hope that such further steps as Her Majesty may please to take with reference to these matters will be directed not only to the immediate suppression of brigandage in Greece but more especially to the removal of its real causes, be they what they may, in discharge of the obligations virtually contracted by Her Majesty and Her Majesty's Allies as the constituted protectors of that kingdom" (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) July 11, [203] 5; after long debate, Motion withdrawn

Amend. on Committee of Supply May 20,
To leave out from "That" and add "this House, upon an examination of the Papers that have been laid before it concerning the recent massacres in Greece, feels itself called upon to express an opinion that the conduct of the Greek Ministers has been highly unsatisfactory, and that this House invites Her Majesty's Government to act as it thinks best on this opinion, and also to concert with its Allies as to the best means of establishing in Greece a Government capable of satisfying the ordinary requirements of a civilised

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. J. E. DENI-SON) Nottinghamshire, N.

Mr. SPEAKER informs the House that he had been honoured by an invitation from the Chancellor of the University of Oxford to attend at Oxford on Wednesday next, in order that the degree of Doctor of Civil Law might be conferred on him by that University; and Mr. SPEAKER said, that should the House be pleased to afford him the indulgence of being absent on that day, he should be happy to proceed to Oxford and show his sense of the compliment which had been proposed to him by his old University

Whereupon Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli expressed the satisfaction of the House at the distinction which was about to be conferred on him, and moved that Mr. Dodson, the Chairman of the Committees of Ways and Means, do take the Chair during the right hon. Gentleman's absence June 20,

Bill—Amendment—Effect of Amendment upon title of Bill—University Tests Bill—Bill, as amended, considered; a new clause moved;
 an Amendment moved, to insert the words
 "within the United Kingdom." An hon.
 Member inquired whether what was proposed would come within the title of the Bill?—
 Mr. Speaker said, the whole question involved in the subject-matter of the Bill might be raised on the Report. Under those circumstances, an hon. Member would have power to move such words, although if adopted they would necessitate an alteration in the title of the Bill, [202] 1386

Bill—The same Question not to be again con-resolved in the affirmative or negative in the same Session—Emigration to the Colonies, [201] 824

One of the objects of the [Game Laws Abolition] Bill being to repeal the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 14; but the House having already rejected another Bill for the repeal of the said Act, it was objected that, as the House could not consider the same question twice in the same Session, this would be fatal to the passing of this Bill—Mr. Speaker pointed out that this Bill had been printed before the decision referred to was arrived at:—the course would be, that the Bill should proceed until they came to the Schedule in Committee, when it would be competent to strike out so much of the Bill as proposed the repeal of the Act in question, [203] 563

Debate—Explanation—Time for making Explanation—An hon. Member rising and interrupting a Member speaking for the purpose of offering an explanation, Mr. Speaker intimated that the hon. and gallant Member could explain himself when the First Lord of the Treasury had concluded his observations—Naval Retirement—Resolution, [200] 165

Debate—Reference to debate in same Session—No Member is to allude to any debate in the same Session upon a Question or Bill not being then under discussion, except by the indulgence of the House for personal explanation, [203] 1613

Debate—Reference to Reports of Debates in Book or Newspaper—No Member may read from a printed newspaper or book the report of any speech made in Parliament during the present Session, [203] 1613

Debate—Speaking twice in the same debate—Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Conventual and Monastic Institutions (Mr. Newdegate). Mr. Newdegate rose to address the House, but was met with cries of Order! Order! Chair! Chair! Mr. Speaker said, that as the hon. Member had already spoken in the debate, he could not again address the House without its permission, [201] 52, 55, 56

Debate—Speaking twice in the same debate—An hon. Member who has moved the adjournment of the debate has exhausted his powers of speaking—Elementary Education Bill, [202] 298

Debate—Effect of Re-committal of Bill on the right of Members who have given notice of Amendments in Committee to speak

It having been proposed that the Elementary Education Bill should be committed pro forma in order that Amendments might be made—an hon. Member asked in what positions those Members who had Amendments on the Paper would be placed, if that course were adopted. Mr. Speaker said, that if the House should go into Committee pro forma, and the Bill should be reprinted, every hon. Member would, at the recommencement of the debate, be informed as to the main principles of the change proposed by the Prime Minister; and every hon. Member who had an Amendment on the Paper would have a right to speak—Elementary Education Bill, [202] 298, 299

Debate—Premature discussion of a Question.

Moved, "That the (Game Laws Amendment) Bill be now read the second time." An hon. Member proceeding to discuss the whole question of Game Laws—Mr. Speaker said, that the discussion must be confined to the special Bill before them:—There was also this additional reason—that notice had been given of the general question of the Game Laws for a future day—Game Laws Amendment Bill, [200] 7

Debate—Relevancy of Debate—On Mr. Fowler's Motion for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the Contagious Diseases Acts, (1866-69)—Mr. Speaker had been called upon to enforce the rule which forbids the presence of Strangers at the debates of the House. Mr. Henley, pursuant to notice "to draw the attention of the House to the rule or practice of ordering Strangers to withdraw, and the effect thereof," was proceeding to point out the nature of the Acts proposed to be repealed—Mr. Speaker said, that the right hon. Gentleman's notice referred to the rule or practice of excluding Strangers. He might, no doubt, think the occasion on which the right had been exercised a very important one; but Mr. Speaker thought he was not in order in entering into the details of that subject, [201] 1643; [203] 1560

Debate—Relevancy of Debate—Moved, "That the (Game Laws Amendment) Bill be now read the second time." An hon. Member was proceeding to discuss the whole question of the Game Laws—Mr. Speaker said, the hon. Gentleman was not in order in discussing the general question. They had a Bill before them for a particular object, and the discussion must be confined to that Bill—Game Laws Amendment Bill, [200] 7

Debate—Right of Reply—An hon. Member having put a Question, which was answered, sought to make some observations thereon—Mr. Speaker said, the hon. Gentleman was entering upon a reply—Bridgwater Election, [199] 805

Debate—Order—To refer to a statement which has been denied by a Member in his place is out of order. It having been stated that Mr. Heron, then a candidate for the county of Tipperary, had upon the hustings called on the mob to give three cheers for the Fenian prisoners; and the hon. and learned Gentleman (who was returned) having denied in the House the language imputed to him—an hon. Member would be out of order in persisting in his reference to the statement—Ireland—Case of Mr. Madden, [200] 918

Debate—Un-Parliamentary Language—The word "calumnious" has been called in question on a previous occasion, when it was not considered to be a word which was un-Parliamentary—Navy—Case of Commander Gurdon, [201] 1455

Debate—Un-Parliamentary Language—An hon. Member having said that the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had made statements which, from his experience, he would show to be entirely false—Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member means to say erroneous—Unemployed Labour, [202] 442

Fowler*), Mr. Craufurd rose, and said: "Mr. Speaker, I see Strangers present." Mr. Speaker suggested to the hon. and learned Member that he should not insist on excluding strangers. But Mr. Craufurd insisting—Mr. Speaker directed the Galleries to be cleared, [201] 1307

Mr. Henley said: He saw Strangers in the House; Whereupon Mr. Speaker ordered strangers to withdraw, [203] 651
